responsibility. The Committee will indicate in the course of this Report how they visualise the relations between the two parts of the provincial government, but they wish to place in the forefront of the Report their opinion that they see no reason why the relations should not be harmonious and mutually advantageous. They regard it as of the highest importance that the Governor should foster the habit of free consultation between both halves of his government, and indeed that he should insist upon it in all important matters of common interest. He will thus ensure that ministers will contribute their knowledge of the people's wishes and susceptibilities, and the members of his Executive Council their administrative experience, to the joint wisdom of the government. But while the Committee anticipate much advantage from amicable and, as far as possible, spontaneous association for purposes of deliberation, they would not allow it to confuse the duties or obscure the separate responsibility which will rest on the two parts of the administration. Each side of the government will advise and assist the other; neither will control or impede the other. The responsibility for administrative and legislative action in their own field will be fixed beyond possibility of doubt on ministers and on the majorities of the provincial legislatures which support them; and they will be given adequate power to fulfil their charge. Similarly within that field for which he remains accountable to Parliament, the responsibility for action must be fixed on the Governor-in-Council, and he must possess unfailing means for the discharge of his duties. Finally, behind the provincial authorities stands the Government of India.

6. The change which this Bill will make in the political structure and life of India is very important. It marks a great step in the path of self-government, and it is a proof of the confidence reposed by His Majesty's Government in the loyalty, wisdom and capacity of our Indian fellow-subjects. At the same time it points to the desirability of keeping Parliament in closer touch with Indian affairs than has recently been possible. The Committee accordingly propose that a Standing Joint Committee should be appointed by both Houses of Parliament for that purpose. It should have no statutory functions, but a purely advisory and consultative status; and among its tasks is one of high importance, the consideration of amendments to rules made under this Bill. For the plan on which the Bill has been drafted, and in the opinion of the Committee rightly drafted, will necessitate the completion of some of its main provisions by a large number of rules and other documents which will have to be framed before the machinery established by the Bill can come into working order. Many of these rules and documents will be drafted in India for the approval of the Secretary of State. When they come to England, it may be found convenient that the present Committee be re-appointed to advise Parliament in regard to them.

7. The Committee will now proceed to indicate the nature of the changes they have made in the Bill, and also their suggestions for action to be taken under it, either in the framing of rules or by executive process hereafter.

PREAMBLE.

The Preamble of the Bill, as drafted, was based on the announcement of His Majesty's Government in Parliament of the 20th August, 1917, and it incorporated that part of the announcement which pointed to the progressive realisation of responsible government in British India as an integral part of the Empire, and to the expediency of gradually developing self-governing institutions in India, and it referred to the granting to the Provinces of India of a large measure of independence of the Government of India. It did not, however, deal with those parts of the announcement which spoke of the increasing association of Indians in every branch of the administration, and declared that the progress of this policy could only be achieved by successive stages, and that Parliament, advised by his Majesty's Government and by the Government of India, on whom the responsibility lies for the welfare and advancement of the Indian people, must be the judge of the time and measure of each advance, and be guided by the co-operation received from those upon whom new opportunities of service are conferred and by the extent to which it is found that confidence can be reposed in their sense of responsibility.

The Committee have enlarged the preamble so as to include all parts of the announcement of the 20th August, 1917. Their reason for doing so is that an attempt has been made to distinguish between the parts of this announcement, and to attach a different value to each part according to opinion. It has been said, for instance, that whereas the first part is a binding pledge, the later part is a mere expression of opinion of no importance. But the Committee think that is of the utmost importance, from the very inauguration of these constitutional changes, that Parliament should make it quite plain that the responsibility for the successive stages of the development of self-goverment in India rests on itself and on itself alone, and that it cannot share this responsibility with, much less delegate it to, the newly-elected legislatures of India.

They also desire to emphasize the wisdom and justice of an increasing association of Indians with every branch of the administration, but they wish to make it perfectly clear that His Majesty's Government must remain free to appoint Europeans to those posts for which they are specially required and qualified.

PART I.

Clause 1.—The Committee wish to take this opportunity of acknowledging the debt they owe to the work of the two Committees on Franchise and Functions presided over by Lord Southborough. If they are not able to accept all the conclusions of these Committees, and if they recommend some additional provisions to those included in those reports, it does not mean that they are not very sensible of the value of the work done, without which, indeed, this constitutional change could not have been effected.

The lists of central, provincial and transferred subjects included in the Functions Committee's report have been somewhat altered after consultation with the India Office (see Appendix F to the Minutes of Evidence); and as so amended they are accepted by this Committee, subject to certain general observations at the end of this Report. It must not, however, be concluded that these partitions of the functions of government are absolutely clear-cut and mutually exclusive. They must in all cases be read with the reservations in the text of the Functions Committee's report, and with due regard to the necessity for special procedure in cases where their orbits overlap.

The Committee have given much attention to the difficult question of the principle on which the provincial revenues and balances should be distributed between the two sides of the provincial governments. They are confident that the problem can readily be solved by the simple process of common sense and reasonable give-and-take, but they are aware that this question might, in certain circumstances, become the cause of much friction in the provincial government, and they are of opinion that the rules governing the allocation of these revenues and balances should be framed so as to make the existence of such friction impossible. They advise that, if the Governor, in the course of preparing either his first or any subsequent budget, finds that there is likely to be a serious or protracted difference of opinion between the executive council and his ministers on this subject, he should be empowered at once to make an allocation of revenue and balances between the reserved and transferred subjects, which should continue for at least the whole life of the existing legislative council. The Committee do not endorse the suggestion that certain sources of revenue should be allocated to reserved, and certain sources to transferred subjects, but they recommend that the Governor should allocate a definite proportion of the revenue, say, by way of illustration, two-thirds to reserved and one-third to transferred subjects, and similarly a proportion, though not necessarily the same fraction, of the balances. If the Governor desires assistance in making the allocation, he should be allowed at his discretion to refer the question to be decided to such authority as the Governor-General shall appoint. Further, the Committee are of opinion that it should be laid down from the first that, until an agreement which both sides of the Government will equally support has been reached, or until an allocation has been made by the Governor, the total provisions of the different expenditure heads in the budget of the province for the preceding financial year shall hold good.

The Committee desire that the relation of the two sides of the Government in this matter, as in all others, should be of such mutual sympathy that each will be able to assist and influence for the common good the work of the other, but not to exercise control over it. The budget should not be capable of being used as a means for enabling ministers or a majority of the legislative council to direct the policy of reserved subjects; but on the other hand the executive council should be helpful to ministers in their desire to develop the departments entrusted to their care. On the Governor personally will devolve the task of holding the balance between the legitimate needs of both sets of his advisers.

Clause 2.—This clause has been inserted to regularise the raising of loans by local governments on the special security of their own provincial revenues.

Clause 3.—The question has been raised as to the communications between the Governors of provinces and the Secretary of State. The question as to whether such communications shall in future take place, and as to the procedure to be adopted in them, may well be left to the Secretary of State. In the opinion of the Committee there is no cause at present for disturbing the existing position, except to the extent to which the Secretary of State relaxes his powers of direction and control over local governments. To that extent the Government of India will also withdraw from intervention; but India is not yet ripe for a true federal system, and the central government cannot be relegated to functions of mere inspection and advice. The Committee trust that there will be an extensive delegation, statutory and otherwise, to provincial governments of some powers and duties now in the hands of the Government of India; and they trust also that the control of that Government over provincial matters will be exercised with a view to preparing the provinces for the gradual transfer of power to the provincial government and legislature.

Clause 4.—The Committee are of opinion that the ministers selected by the Governor to advise him on the transferred subjects should be elected members of the legislative council, enjoying its confidence and capable of leading it. A minister will have the option of resigning if his advice is not accepted by the Governor; and the Governor will have the ordinary constitutional right of dismissing a minister whose policy he believes to be either seriously at fault or out of accord with the views of the legislative council. In the last resort the Governor can always dissolve his legislative council and choose new ministers after a fresh election; but if this course is adopted the Committee hope that the Governor will find himself able to accept such views as his new ministers may press upon him regarding the issue which forced the dissolution. The Committee are of opinion that in no province will there be need for less than two ministers, while in some provinces more will be required. In these circumstances they think that it should be recognised from the commencement that ministers may be expected to act in concert together. They probably would do so; and in the opinion of the Committee it is better that they should, and therefore that the fact should be recognised on the face of the Bill. They advise that the status of ministers should be similar to that of the members of the executive council, but that their salaries should be fixed by the legislative council. Later on in this Report it will be suggested that Indian members of the Council of India in London should be paid a higher scale of remuneration than those members of the Council domiciled in the United Kingdom. The same principle might suggest to the legislative council that it was reasonable for the ministers of the provincial government domiciled in India to be paid on a lower scale of remuneration than the European members.

Provision has been made in this clause for the appointment, at the Governor's discretion, of non-official members of the legislative council to fill a role somewhat similar to that of the Parliamentary Under-Secretary in this country.

Clause 5.—The Committee are of opinion that the normal strength of an executive council, especially in the smaller provinces, need not exceed two members. They have not, however, reduced the existing statutory maximum of four; but if in any case the council includes two members with service qualifications, neither of whom is by birth an Indian, they think that it should also include two unofficial Indian members.

Clause 6.—The Committee desire at this point to give a picture of the manner in which they think that, under this Bill, the government of a province should be worked. There will be many matters of administrative business, as in all countries, which can be disposed of departmentally; But there will remain a large category of business, of the character which would naturally be the subject of Cabinet consultation. In regard to this category the Committee conceive that the habit should be carefully fostered of joint deliberation between the members of the executive council and the ministers, sitting under the chairmanship of the Governor. There cannot be too much mutual advice and consultation on such subjects. But the Committee attach the highest importance to the principle that, when once opinions have been freely exchanged and the last word has been said, there ought then to be no doubt whatever as to where the responsibility for the decision lies. Therefore, in the opinion of the Committee, after such consultation, and when it is clear that the decision lies within the jurisdiction of one or other half of the Government, that decision in respect of a reserved subject should be recorded separately by the executive council, and in respect of a transferred subject by the ministers, and all acts and proceedings of the government should state in definite terms on whom the responsibility for the decision rests. It will not always, however, be clear, otherwise than in a purely departmental and technical fashion, with whom the jurisdiction lies in the case of questions of common interest. In such cases it will be inevitable for the Governor to occupy the position of informal arbitrator between the two parts of his administration; and it will equally be his duty to see that a decision arrived at on one side of his government is followed by such consequential action on the other side as may be necessary to make the policy effective and homogeneous.

The position of the Governor will thus be one of great responsibility and difficulty, and also of great opportunity and honour. He may have to hold the balance between divergent policies and different ideals, and to prevent discord and friction. It will also be for him to help with sympathy and courage the popular side of his government in their new responsibilities. He should never hesitate to point out to ministers what he thinks is the right course or to warn them if he thinks they are taking the wrong course. But if, after hearing all the arguments, ministers should decide not to adopt his advice, then, in the opinion of the Committee, the Governor should ordinarily allow ministers to have their way, fixing the responsibility upon them, even if it may subsequently be necessary for him to veto any particular piece of legislation. It is not possible but that in India, as in all other countries, mistakes will be made by ministers, acting with the approval of a majority of the legislative council, but there is no way of learning except through experience and by the realisation of responsibility.

In the debates of the legislative council members of the executive council should act together and ministers should act together, but members of the executive council and ministers should not oppose each other by speech or vote; members of the executive council should not be required to support either by speech or vote proposals of ministers of which they do not approve, nor should ministers be required to support by speech or vote proposals of the executive council of which they do not approve; they should be free to speak and vote for each other's proposals when they are in agreement with them. All other official members of the legislative council should be free to speak and vote as they choose.

Clause 7.—The Committee have altered the first schedule to the Bill, so as to show only the total strength of the legislative council in each province. They have retained the provision, now in sub-clause (2), that at least 70 per cent. of the members shall be elected, and not more than 20 per cent. shall be officials. This general stipulation will govern the distribution of the seats in each province; but in certain respects the detailed arrangements will require further consideration, and proposals should be called for from the Government of India in regard to them. The points in question, as well as some disputable matters on which the Committee wish to endorse the proposals of the Franchise Committee's report, are dealt with in the following recommendations :—

(a) The Committee regard the number of seats allotted to the rural population, as distinct from the urban, as disproportionately low and consider that it should receive a larger share of representation. They also think that an attempt should be made to secure better representation of the urban wage-earning class; and they are convinced that an effort should be made to remedy in part at least the present disparity between the size of the electorates in the different provinces. In all those matters no definite instructions need be given. The Government of India should be left a wide discretion in adjusting the figures, subject, however, to the understanding that the adjustment should be effected in all cases rather by enlargement than by diminution of the representation proposed in the Franchise Committee's report.

(b) The Committee are of opinion that the representation proposed for the depressed classes is inadequate. Within this definition are comprised, as shown in the report of the Franchise Committee, a large proportion of the whole population of India. They think that the Government of India should, as it advises, be instructed to give such classes a larger share of representation by nomination, regard being had to the numbers of depressed classes in each province, and after consultation with the Local Governments. This representation should, if necessary, be in addition to, but not in diminution of, the general electorate. Whenever possible, other persons than members of the Civil Services should be selected to represent the depressed classes, but if a member of those services, specially qualified for this purpose, has to be appointed, his nomination should not operate to increase the maximum ratio of official seats.

(c) In the Madras Presidency the Committee consider that the non-Brahmins must be provided with separate representation by means of the reservation of seats. The Brahmins and non-Brahmins should be invited to settle the matter by negotiation among themselves; and it would only be, if agreement cannot be reached in that way, that the decision should be referred to an arbitrator appointed for the purpose by the Government of India.

(d) The Committee would recommend that similar treatment be accorded to the Mahrattas in the Bombay Presidency.

(e) The question whether women should or should not be admitted to the franchise on the same terms as men should be left to the newly elected legislative council of each province to settle by resolution. The Government of India should be instructed to make rules so that, if a legislative council so voted, women might be put upon the register of voters in that province. The Committee have not felt able to settle this question themselves, as urged by the majority of witnesses who appeared before them. It seems to them to go deep into the social system and susceptibilities of India, and, therefore, to be a question which can only, with any prudence be settled in accordance with the wishes of Indians themselves as constitutionally expressed.

(f) The Committee are of opinion that the franchise as settled by the rules to be made under this Act should not be altered for the first ten years, and that it should at present be outside the power of the Legislative Councils to make any alteration in the franchise. The recommendation, therefore, in respect of woman suffrage, is to be regarded as altogether exceptional, and as not forming any precedent in respect of proposals for other alterations.

(g) The special representation of landholders in the provinces should be reconsidered by the Government of India in consultation with the local governments.

(h) The franchise for the University seats should be extended to all graduates of over seven years' standing.

(i) The Government of India should be instructed to consult with the Government of Bengal in respect of the representation of Europeans in Bengal. It appears to the Committee that there are good reasons for a readjustment of that representation. The recommendations of the report of the Franchise Committee in respect of European representation in other provinces may be accepted.

(j) The question whether the rulers and subjects of Indian States may be registered as electors or may be elected to the legislative councils should be left to be settled in each case by the local government of the province.

(k) The Committee are of opinion that dismissal from the service of the government in India should not be a disqualification for election, but that a criminal conviction entailing a sentence of more than six months' imprisonment should be a disqualification for five years from the date of the expiration of the sentence.

(l) The compromise suggested by the Franchise Committee in respect of the residential qualification of candidates for legislative councils whereby the restriction was to be imposed only in the provinces of Bombay, the Punjab, and the Central Provinces may be accepted.

(m) The recommendations of the Franchise Committee in respect of the proportionate representations of Mohammedans, based on the Lucknow compact, may be accepted.

Two further observations must be made on this question of franchise. It seems to the Committee that the principle of proportional representation may be found to be particularly applicable to the circumstances of India, and they recommend that this suggestion be fully explored, so that there may be material for consideration by the Statutory Commission when it sits at the end of ten years. Further it has been strongly represented to the Committee, and the Committee are themselves firmly convinced, that a complete and stringent Corrupt Practices Act should be passed and brought into operation before the first elections for the legislative councils. There is no such Act at present in existence in India, and the Committee are convinced that it will not be less required in India than it is in other countries.

Clause 9.—The Committee have considered carefully the question who is to preside over the legislative councils in the provinces. They are of opinion that the Governor should not preside, and they advise that, for a period of four years, the President should be appointed by the Governor. Wherever possible it would be a great advantage if someone could be found for this purpose who had had parliamentary experience. The legislative council should itself elect a Vice-President, and at the end of four years the nominated President would disappear, and the President and Vice-President would be elected by the councils. The Committee attribute the greatest importance to this question of the Presidency of the legislative council. It will, in their opinion, conduce very greatly to the successful working of the new councils if they are imbued from the commencement with the spirit and conventions of parliamentary procedure as developed in the Imperial Parliament. The Committee will recur to this subject in dealing with the question of the President of the Legislative Assembly of India.

Clause 11.—The Committee think that the provincial budget should be submitted to the vote of the legislative council, subject to the exemption from this process of certain charges of a special or recurring character which have been set out in the Bill. In cases where the council alter the provision for a transferred subject, the Committee consider that the Governor would be justified, if so advised by his ministers, in re-submitting the provision to the council for a review of their former decision; but they do not apprehend that any statutory prescription to that effect is required. Where the council have reduced a provision for a reserved subject which the Governor considers essential to the proper administration of the subject concerned, he will have a power of restoration. The Committee wish it to be perfectly clear that this power is real and that its exercise should not be regarded as unusual or arbitrary; unless the Governor has the right to secure supply for those services for which he remains responsible to Parliament, that responsibility cannot justly be fastened upon him.

Whenever the necessity for new taxation arises, as arise it must, the questions involved should be threshed out by both parts of the Government in consultation together, and it is especially important that in this matter both parts of the Government should, if possible, be in agreement when the proposals of the Government are laid before the legislature.

Clause 13.—The Committee have rejected the plan of Grand Committees as drafted originally in the Bill. They have done so because in their opinion the Grand Committee did not give the Governor the power of securing legislation in a crisis in respect of those matters for which he is held responsible, and because in respect of ordinary legislation about reserved subjects it perpetuated the system of securing legislation by what is known as the "official bloc," which has been the cause of great friction and heartburning. The responsibility for legislation on reserved subjects is with the Governor in Council, and, when the "official bloc" has been put into operation, it has been put into operation by him, and is merely an indirect way of asserting his responsibility. The Committee think it much better that there should be no attempt to conceal the fact that the responsibility is with the Governor in Council, and they recommend a process by which the Governor should be empowered to pass an Act in respect of any reserved subject, if he considers that the Act is necessary for the proper fulfilment of his responsibility to Parliament. He should not do so until he has given every opportunity for the matter to be thoroughly discussed in the legislative council, and as a sensible man he should, of course, endeavour to carry the legislative council with him in the matter by the strength of his case. But, if he finds that cannot be so, then he should have the power to proceed on his own responsibility. Acts passed on his sole responsibility should be reserved by the Governor-General for His Majesty's pleasure, and be laid before Parliament. His Majesty will necessarily be advised by the Secretary of State for India, and the responsibility forthe advice to be given to His Majesty can only rest with the Secretary of State. But the Committee suggest that the Standing Committee of Parliament, whose appointment they have advised, should be specially consulted about Acts of this character. Provision, however, is made in the Bill for the avoidance of delay in case of a grave emergency by giving the Governor-General power to assent to the Act without reserving it, though this of course would not prevent subsequent disallowance by His Majesty in Council.

Clause 15.—The Committee have two observations to make on the working of this Clause. On the one hand, they do not think that any change in the boundaries of a province should be made without due consideration of the views of the legislative council of the province. On the other hand, they are of opinion that any clear request made by a majority of the members of a legislative council representing a distinctive racial or linguistic territorial unit for its constitution under this Clause as a sub-province or a separate province should be taken as a prima facie case on the strength of which a commission of inquiry might be appointed by the Secretary of State, and that it should not be a bar to the appointment of such a commisson of inquiry that the majority of the legislative council of the province in question is opposed to the request of the minority representing such a distinctive territorial unit.

Part II.

Clause 18.—As will be explained below, the Committee do not accept the device, in the Bill as drafted, of carrying government measures through the Council of State without reference to the Legislative Assembly, in cases where the latter body cannot be got to assent to a law which the Governor-General considers essential. Under the scheme which the Committee propose to substitute for this procedure, there is no necessity to retain the Council of State as an organ for government legislation. It should therefore be reconstituted from the commencement as a true Second Chamber. They recommend that it should consist of sixty members, of whom not more than twenty should be official members. The Franchise Committee advise that the non-official members should be elected by the same group of persons as elect the members of the Legislative Assembly and in the same constituencies. This is a plan which the Committee could, in no circumstances, accept. They hope and believe that a different system of election for the Council of State can be devised by the time the constitution embodied in this Bill comes into operation, and they recommend that the Government of India be enjoined forthwith to make suggestions accordingly, to which effect can be given without delaying the inauguration of the new constitution. If the advice of the Committee that it be re-appointed for the purpose of considering the rules to be framed under this Bill be approved, it should have an opportunity of considering the proposals made for the election of the Council of State.

Clause 19.—For the Legislative Assembly the Committee are equally unwilling to accept, as a permanent arrangement, the method of indirect election proposed in the report of the Franchise Committee. If by no other course it were possible to avoid delay in bringing the constitution enacted by the Bill into operation, the Committee would acquiesce in that method for a preliminary period of three years. But they are not convinced that delay would be involved in preparing a better scheme of election, and they endorse the views expressed by the Government of India in paragraph 39 of its despatch dealing with the subject. They accordingly advise that the Government of India be instructed at once to make recommendations to this effect at the earliest possible moment. These recommendations as embodied in draft rules would also be subject to examination by this Committee if re-appointed.

Clause 20.—The Committee think that the President of the Legislative Assembly should for four years be a person appointed by the Governor-General. He should be qualified by experience in the House of Commons and a knowledge of parliamentary procedure, precedents, and conventions. He should be the guide and adviser of the Presidents of the provincial councils, and he should be chosen with a view to the influence which it is hoped he would have on the whole history of parliamentary procedure in India. He should be paid an adequate salary.

Clause 25.—This is a new provision for the submission of the Indian Budget to the vote of the Legislative Assembly, on the understanding that this body is constituted as a chamber reasonably representative in character and elected directly by suitable constituencies. The Committee consider it necessary (as suggested to them by the consolidated fund charges in the Imperial Parliament) to exempt certain charges of a special or recurring nature, which have been set out in the Bill, e.g., the cost of defence, the debt charges and certain fixed salaries, from the process of being voted. But otherwise they would leave the Assembly free to criticise and vote the estimates of expenditure of the Government of India. It is not, however, within the scheme of the Bill to introduce at the present stage any measure of responsible government into the central administration, and a power must be reserved to the Governor-General in Council of treating as sanctioned any expenditure which the Assembly may have refused to vote if he considers the expenditure to be necessary for the fulfilment of his responsibilities for the good government of the country. It should be understood from the beginning that this power of the Governor-General in Council is real, and that it is meant to be used if and when necessary.

Clause 26.—For reasons which prompted their rejection of the process of certification by a Governor to a grand committee in a province, the Committee are opposed to the proposals in the Bill which would have enabled the Governor General to refer to the Council of State, and to obtain by virtue of his official majority in that body, any legislation which the lower chamber refuse to accept, but which he regards as essential to the discharge of his duties. The Committee have no hesitation in accepting the view that the Governor-General in Council should in all circumstances be fully empowered to secure legislation which is required for the discharge of his responsibilities; but they think it is unworthy that such responsibility should be concealed through the action of a Council of State specially devised in its composition to secure the necessary powers. They believe that in such a case it would add strength to the Government of India to act before the world on its own responsibility. In order, however, that Parliament may be fully apprised of the position and of the considerations which led to this exceptional procedure, they advise that all Acts passed in this manner should be laid before Parliament, who would naturally consider the opinion of the standing committee already referred to.

Clause 28.—The recommendation of the Committee is that the present limitation on the number of the members of the Governor-General's Executive Council should be removed, that three members of that Council should continue to be public servants or ex-public servants who have had not less than ten years' experience in the service of the Crown in India; that one member of the Council should have definite legal qualifications, but that those qualifications may be gained in India as well as in the United Kingdom; and that not less than three members of the Council should be Indians. In this connection it must be borne in mind that the members of the Council drawn from the ranks of the public servants will, as time goes on, be more and more likely to be of Indian rather than of European extraction.

Clause 29.—The Committee have inserted this provision to allow of the selection of members of the legislature who will be able to undertake duties similar to those of the Parliamentary Under-Secretaries in this country. It should be entirely at the discretion of the Governor-General to say to which departments these officers should be attached, and to define the scope of their duties.

PART III.

Clause 30.—The Committee think that all charges of the India Office, not being "agency" charges, should be paid out of moneys to be provided by Parliament.

Clause 31.—The Committee are not in favour of the abolition of the Council of India. They think that, at any rate for some time to come, it will be absolutely necessary that the Secretary of State should be advised by persons of Indian experience, and they are convinced that, if no such Council existed, the Secretary of State would have to form an informal one if not a formal one. Therefore, they think it much better to continue a body which has all the advantages behind it of tradition and authority, although they would not debar the readjustment of its work so as to make it possible to introduce what is known as the portfolio system. They think, also, that its constitution may advantageously be modified by the introduction of more Indians into it and by shortening of the period of the service upon it, in order to ensure a continuous flow of fresh experience from India and to relieve Indian members from the necessity of spending so long a period as seven years in England.

Clause 33.—The Committee have given most careful consideration to the relations of the Secretary of State with the Government of India, and through it with the provincial governments. In the relations of the Secretary of State with the Governor-General in Council the Committee are not of opinion that any statutory change can be made, so long as the Governor-General remains responsible to Parliament; but in practice the conventions which now govern these relations may wisely be modified to meet fresh circumstances caused by the creation of a Legislative Assembly with a large elected majority. In the exercise of his responsibility to Parliament, which he cannot delegate to anyone else, the Secretary of State may reasonably consider that only in exceptional circumstances should he be called upon to intervene in matters of purely Indian interest where the Government and the Legislature of India are in agreement.

This examination of the general proposition leads inevitably to the consideration of one special case of non-intervention. Nothing is more likely to endanger the good relations between India and Great Britain than a belief that India's fiscal policy is dictated from Whitehall in the interests of the trade of Great Britain. That such a belief exists at the moment there can be no doubt. That there ought to be no room for it in the future is equally clear. India's position in the Imperial Conference opened the door to negotiation between India and the rest of the Empire, but negotiation without power to legislate is likely to remain ineffective. A satisfactory solution of the question can only be guaranteed by the grant of liberty to the Government of India to devise those tariff arrangements which seem best fitted to India's needs as an integral portion of the British Empire. It cannot be guaranteed by statute without limiting the ultimate power of Parliament to control the administration of India, and without limiting the power of veto which rests in the Crown; and neither of these limitations finds a place in any of the Statutes in the British Empire. It can only therefore be assured by an acknowledgment of a convention. Whatever be the right fiscal policy for India, for the needs of her consumers as well as for her manufacturers, it is quite clear that she should have the same liberty to consider her interests as Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand, Canada and South Africa. In the opinion of the Committee, therefore, the Secretary of State should as far as possible avoid interference on this subject when the Government of India and its Legislature are in agreement, and they think that his intervention, when it does take place, should be limited to safeguarding the international obligations of the Empire or any fiscal arrangements within the Empire to which His Majesty's Government is a party.

The relations of the Secretary of State and of the Government of India with provincial governments should, in the Committee's judgment, be regulated by similar principles, so far as the reserved subjects are concerned. It follows, therefore, that in purely provincial matters, which are reserved, where the provincial government and legislature are in agreement, their view should ordinarily be allowed to prevail, though it is necessary to bear in mind the fact that some reserved subjects do cover matters in which the central government is closely concerned. Over transferred subjects, on the other hand, the control of the Governor-General in Council, and thus of the Secretary of State, should be restricted in future within the narrowest possible limits, which will be defined by rules under sub-clause 3 of Clause 1 of the Bill.

Rules under this clause will be subsidiary legislation of sufficient moment to justify their being brought especially to the notice of Parliament. The Secretary of State might conveniently discuss them with the Standing Committee whose creation has been recommended in this Report; and Parliament would no doubt consider the opinion of this body when the rules come, as it is proposed that they should do, for acceptance by positive resolution in both Houses. The same procedure is recommended by the Committee for adoption in the case of rules of special or novel importance under other clauses of the Bill. It must be for the Secretary of State to decide which of the many rules that will fall to be drafted by the Government of India can be sufficiently dealt with by the ordinary process of lying on the table of Parliament for a certain number of days. In deciding this point, however, he may naturally have recourse to the advice of the Standing Committee, should it happen to be in session, and obtain their assistance in determining which rules deserve to be made the subject of the more formal procedure by positive resolution.

Clause 35.—This clause carries out the recommendation of Lord Crewe's Committee to appoint a High Commissioner for India, to be paid out of Indian revenues, who will perform for India functions of agency, as distinguished from political functions, analogous to those now performed in the offices of the High Commissioners of the Dominions.

PART IV.

Clause 36.—The Committee do not conceal from themselves that the position of the public services in working the new constitutions in the provinces will, in certain circumstances, be difficult. They are of opinion that these services have deserved the admiration and gratitude of the whole Empire. They know that some members of the services regard the wisdom of the proposed changes with grave misgiving, and that some fear that those changes will not tend to the welfare of the Indian masses. They are convinced, however, that the services will accept the changing conditions and the inevitable alteration in their own position, and devote themselves in all loyalty to making a success, so far as in them lies, of the new constitution.

In the provinces, officers serving in a reserved department will be controlled by the Governor in Council, and in a transferred department by the Governor acting with ministers, but in both cases alike the personal concurrence of the Governor should be regarded as essential in the case of all orders of any importance prejudicially affecting the position or prospects of officers appointed by the Secretary of State.

The Committee think that every precaution should be taken to secure to the public servants the career in life to which they looked forward when they were recruited, and they have introduced fresh provisions into this clause to that end. If friction occurs, a re-adjustment of persons and plac[redacted] may often get over the difficulty, and the Governor must always regard it as one of his most important duties to establish a complete understanding between his ministers and the officers through whom they will have to work. But if there are members of the service whose doubts as to the changes to be made are so deeply-rooted that they feel they cannot usefully endeavour to take part in them, then the Committee think it would only be fair to those officers that they should be offered an equivalent career elsewhere, if it is in the power of His Majesty's Government to do so, or, in the last resort, that they should be allowed to retire on such pension as the Secretary of State in Council may consider suitable to their period of service.

Part V.

Clause 41.—The Committee are of opinion that the Statutory Commission should not be appointed until the expiration of ten years, and that no changes of substance in the constitution, whether in the franchise or in the lists of reserved and transferred subjects or otherwise, should be made in the interval. The Commission will be fully empowered to examine the working of the constitutions in all their details in the provinces, and to advise whether the time has come for full responsible government in each province, or in the alternative whether and to what extent the powers of self-government already granted should be extended, or modified, or restricted. It should be clearly understood, also, that the Commission should be empowered to examine into the working of the Government of India and to advise in respect of the Government of India no less than in respect of the provincial governments.

8. This concludes the Committee's specific recommendations on the Bill. There remain certain other topics which do not conveniently fall within any particular clause. The first of these is the treatment of Burma, and after hearing evidence the Committee have not advised that Burma should be included within the scheme. They do not doubt but that the Burmese have deserved and should receive a constitution analogous to that provided in this Bill for their Indian fellow-subjects. But Burma is only by accident part of the responsibility of the Governor-General of India. The Burmese are as distinct from the Indians in race and language as they are from the British.

9. Doubts have been expressed from several quarters questioning the financial adjustment proposed between the Central and Provincial Governments in India. Without expressing any opinion on this controversy, the Committee accept and endorse the recommendation of the Government of India that a fully qualified financial commission should be appointed to advise as to the principle on which contributions from the provincial governments to the Central Government should in future be adjusted.

10. The Committee think that it may often greatly assist the political education of India if standing committees of the legislative bodies are attached to certain departments of Government, but they only express this opinion on the understanding that the appointment of such committees, their composition, and the regulations which govern their procedure, shall be matters wholly and exclusively within the discretion of the Governor-General or of the Governor as the case may be

11. The Committee are impressed by the objections raised by many witnesses to the manner in which certain classes of taxation can be laid upon the people of India by executive action without, in some cases, any statutory limitation of the rates and, in other cases, any adequate prescription by statute of the methods of assessment. They consider that the imposition of new burdens should be gradually brought more within the purview of the Legislature. And in particular, without expressing any judgment on the question whether the land revenue is a rent or tax, they advise that the process of revising the land revenue assessments ought to be brought under closer regulation by statute as soon as possible. At present the statutory basis for charging revenue on the land varies in different provinces; but in some at least the pitch of assessment is entirely at the discretion of the executive government. No branch of the administration is regulated with greater elaboration or care; but the people who are most affected have no voice in the shaping of the system, and the rules are often obscure and imperfectly understood by those who pay the revenue. The Committee are of opinion that the time has come to embody in the law the main principles by which the land revenue is determined, the methods of valuation, the pitch of assessment, the periods of revision, the graduation of enhancements, and the other chief processes which touch the well-being of the revenue payers. The subject is one which probably would not be transferred to ministers until the electorate included a satisfactory representation of rural interests, those of the tenantry as well as of the landlords; and the system should be established on a clear statutory basis before this change takes place.

12. The Committee have not hitherto touched on the subject of education in India, and it is far too large for them to make any attempt to deal with it adequately. They have accepted the recommendation of the Functions Committee that, subject to certain reservations about the Universities, the responsibility for the whole field of education in each province should be transferred to ministers. They attach much importance, however, to the educational advancement of the depressed and backward classes, and they trust that the subject will receive special attention from ministers. They are also impressed by the advantage of Boards such as Sir Michael Sadler has advised in Bengal, for the assistance of ministers in controlling the different grades of education, and they trust that ministers will see their way from the outset to constitute such Boards in every province. The Committee would similarly commend to ministers the advisability of creating local government departments in the provinces.

13. The Committee attach the greatest importance to the formation in each provincial government of a strong department of Finance which will serve both sides of the Government alike.

14. The Committee have been greatly struck by the earnest representations made to them by several witnesses, both of British and Indian birth, to the effect that the Government of India and the provincial governments must become more vocal, and put forth their view of what the good of India requires with more courage and more persistence than they have in the past. It has been represented to them that it will be of the utmost importance in the future that the Government of India and the provincial governments should have means of explaining to the people of India the reasons why things are done the reasons which underlie decisions, and the arguments against proposals which they consider will be detrimental to the welfare of the country. It was represented to the Committee that at present, to a great extent, the case for the policy of the Government of India and of the provincial governments is unknown to the masses of Indians, whereas the case against that policy is becoming every day more widely disseminated by means of the vernacular press. They are glad to think that this opinion is also shared by the Secretary of State for India and the Viceroy. It is dealt with in paragraph 326 of their report on Indian Constitutional Reforms.

15. In conclusion the Committee emphatically repudiate the suggestion that the changes in this Bill in the form of the provincial governments of India imply any condemnation of the present system of government in India. The Government of India has accomplished great things for India's good and one of its greatest services has been the introduction into India of a reign of law, to which the Government itself is as much subject as the people it governs. It is no reproach to it that in form it has been everywhere autocratic. So long as Parliament on the one hand did not bestow any form of constitutional self-government on any part of India, and on the other hand held the Government of India rigidly responsible to itself for its every action, it could not be otherwise in the provinces any more than at the central seat of government. But, whatever the form, the spirit of its being everywhere and always has been effort for the welfare of the masses of the people of India.

16. The Committee have directed the Minutes of Proceedings, together with Appendices, to be laid before both Houses of Parliament.

A

Make further provision with respect to the Government of India.

WHEREAS for the purpose of the increasing association of Indians in every branch of Indian Administration, and the gradual development of self-governing institutions, with a view to the progressive realisation of responsible government in British India as an integral part of the Empire, it is expedient that substantial steps in this direction should be taken, and whereas progress in this direction can only be achieved by successive stages:

And whereas the time and manner of each advance can be determined only by Parliament, upon whom responsibility lies for the welfare and advancement of the Indian peoples:

And whereas the action of Parliament in such matters must be guided by the co-operation received from those on whom new opportunities of service will be conferred, and to the extent by which it is found that confidence can be reposed in their sense of responsibility:

And whereas concurrently with the gradual development of self-governing institutions in the Provinces of India it is expedient to give to those Provinces in provincial matters the largest measure of independence of the Government of India, which is compatible with the due discharge by the latter of its own responsibilities:

Be it therefore enacted by the King's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:—

1.—(1) Provision may be made by rules under the Government of India Act, 1915, as amended by the Government of India (Amendment) Act, 1916 (which Act, as so amended, is in this Act referred to as " the principal Act ")—

(a) for the classification of subjects, in relation to the functions of government, as central and provincial subjects, for the purpose of distinguishing the functions of local governments and legislatures from the functions of the Governor-General in Council and the Indian legislature;

(c) for use under the authority of the Governor-General in Council of the agency of local governments in relation to central subjects, in so far as such agency may be found convenient, and for determining the financial conditions of such agency; and

(d) for the transfer from among the provincial subjects of subjects (in this Act referred to as " transferred subjects ") to the administration of the governor acting with the minister in charge of the subject, and for the allocation of provincial funds for the purpose of such administration.

(2) Without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing powers, rules made for the above-mentioned purposes may—

Provincial subjects, other than transferred subjects, are in this Act referred to as " reserved subjects."

(2) Provision may be made by rules under the principal Act as to the conditions under which the power to raise loans on the security of allocated revenues shall be exercised.

(3) The provision in subsection (1) of section thirty of the principal Act which enables the Secretary of State in Council with the concurrence of a majority of votes at a meeting of the Council of India to prescribe provisions or conditions limiting the power to raise money shall cease to have effect as regards the power to raise money on the security of allocated revenues.

The following DRAFT REPORT is laid before the Committee.

ORDERED TO REPORT—

1. That the Committee have met and considered the said Bill and taken the evidence of a large number o witnesses, many of whom had come all the way from India for the purpose. A mass of telegrams and other communications has also been received. The list of witnesses and the telegrams have been printed as an appendix to the evidence. Written representations have not as a rule been printed. The Committee appreciate the advantage they have derived from being placed in full possession of the views of many persons who have given much thought to the political future of the country.

2. The Committee were not charged, as some have seemed to think, with the task of reporting on the state of India, or on the conduct of the administration in India, or even at large on the best form of government for India, but only with the duty of dealing with this Bill, which had been read a second time in the House of Commons, according to the well-known forms of Parliamentary procedure, and with the rules and conventions arising out of it.

3. In the declaration made by His Majesty's Government on the 20th August, 1917, there is enunciated the problem for which the Bill endeavours to provide a solution. It is to design the first stage in a measured progress towards responsible government. Any such stage, if it is to be a real advance, must, as the Committee conceive it, involve the creation of an electorate and the bestowal of some share in the work and responsibilities of government on those whom the electorate chooses to represent its interests. In the present circumstances of India, the electorate must at the outset be small and the administrative experience of its representatives must be limited. Before, therefore, the policy of His Majesty's Government can be fulfilled the electorate must grow, and practical experience in the conduct of public affairs must be enlarged. During this period the guardianship of the peace of India cannot be withdrawn from the care of the official agency which Parliament at present charges with the duties of the administration, and the Committee regard it to be an essential feature of the policy of His Majesty's Government that, except in so far as he is released from responsibility by the changes made under this Bill, the Governor-General-in-Council should remain in undisturbed responsibility to Parliament and fully equipped with the necessary powers to fulfil that responsibility. But from the beginning the people must be given an opportunity, and all political wisdom points to its being a generous opportunity, of learning the actual business of government and of showing, by their conduct of it, to some future Parliament that the time has come for further extensions of power.

4. In the opinion of the Committee the plan proposed by the Bill is conceived wholly in this spirit, and interprets the pronouncement of the 20th August, 1917, with scrupulous accuracy. It partitions the domain of provincial government into two fields, one of which is made over to ministers chosen from the elected members of the provincial legislature, while the other remains under the administration of a Governor-in-Council. This scheme has evoked apprehensions which are not unnatural in view of its novelty. But the Committee, after the most careful consideration of all suggested alternatives, are of opinion that it is the best way of giving effect to the spirit of the declared policy of His Majesty's Government. Its critics forget that the announcement spoke of a substantial step in the direction of the gradual development of self-governing institutions with a view to the progressive realisation of responsible government and not of the partial introduction of responsible government; and it is this distinction which justifies the method by which the Bill imposes responsibility, both on Ministers to the legislative council and on the members of the legislative council to their constituents, for the results of that part of the administration which is transferred to their charge.

5. Having weighed the evidence and information before them, the Committee have made a number of changes in the Bill. Those of a more detailed or miscellaneous character are briefly discussed below under the clauses to which they relate. Those which are directed to the avoidance of the difficulties and dangers which have been pointed out proceed on a simple and, in the Committee's opinion, an indefeasible theory. That theory the Committee think it desirable to state at once. Ministers who enjoy the confidence of a majority in their legislative council will be given the fullest opportunity of managing that field of government which is entrusted to their care. In their work they will be assisted and guided by the Governor, who will accept their advice and promote their policy wherever possible. If he finds himself compelled to act against to their advice, it will only be in circumstances roughly analogous to those in which he has to override his executive council—circumstances which will be indicated in the Instrument of Instructions furnished to him on his appointment by His Majesty. On the other hand, in and for that field of government in which Parliament continues to hold him responsible the provincial Governor-in-Council will remain equipped with the sure and certain power of fulfilling that responsibility. The Committee will indicate in the course of this Report how they visualise the relations between the two parts of the provincial Government, but they wish to place in the forefront of the Report their opinion that they see no reason why the relations should not be harmonious and mutually advantageous. They regard it as of the highest importance that the Governor should foster the habit of free consultation between both halves of his Government, and indeed that he should insist upon it in all important matters of common interest. He will thus ensure that ministers will contribute their knowledge of the people's wishes and susceptibilities, and the members of his Executive Council their administrative experience, to the joint wisdom of the Government. But while the Committee anticipate much advantage from amicable and, as far as possible, spontaneous association for purposes of deliberation, they would not allow it to confuse the duties or obscure the separate responsibility which will rest on the two parts of the administration. Each side of the Government will advise and assist the other : neither will control or impede the other. The responsibility for administrative and legislative action in their own field will be fixed beyond possibility of doubt on ministers and on the majorities of the provincial legislatures which support them ; and they will be given adequate power to fulfil their charge. Similarly within that field for which he remains accountable to Parliament, the responsibility for action must be fixed on the Governor-in-Council, and he must possess unfailing means for the discharge of his duties. Finally, behind the provincial authorities stands the Government of India.

6. The change which this Bill will make in the political structure and life of India is very important. It marks a great step in the path of self-government, and it is a proof of the confidence reposed by His Majesty's Government in the loyalty, wisdom and capacity of our Indian fellow-subjects. At the same time it points to the desirability of keeping Parliament in closer touch with Indian affairs than has recently been possible. The Committee accordingly propose that a Standing Joint Committee should be appointed by both Houses of Parliament for that purpose. It should have no statutory functions, but a purely advisory and consultative status ; and among its tasks is one of high importance, the consideration of amendment to rules made under this Bill. For the plan on which the Bill has been drafted, and in the opinion of the Committee rightly drafted, will necessitate the completion of some of its main provisions by a large number of rules and other documents which will have to be framed before the machinery established by the Bill can come into working order. Many of these rules and documents will be drafted in India for the approval of the Secretary of State. When they come to England it may be found convenient that the present Committee be reappointed to advise Parliament in regard to them.

7. The Committee will now proceed to indicate the nature of the changes they have made in the Bill, and also their suggestions for action to be taken under it, either in the framing of rules or by executive process hereafter.

Preamble.

The Preamble of the Bill, as drafted, was based on the announcement of His Majesty's Government in Parliament of the 20th August, 1917, and it incorporated that part of the announcement which pointed to the progressive realisation of responsible government in British India as an integral part of the Empire, and to the expediency of gradually developing self-governing institutions in India, and it referred to the granting to the Provinces of India of a large measure of independence of the Government of India. It did not, however, deal with those parts of the announcement which spoke of the increasing association of Indians in every branch of the administration and declared that the progress of this policy could only be achieved by successive stages, and that Parliament, advised by His Majesty's Government and by the Government of India, on whom the responsibility lies for the welfare and advancement of the Indian people, must be the judge of the time and measure of each advance, and be guided by the co-operation received from those upon whom new opportunities of service are conferred and by the extent to which it is found that confidence can be reposed in their sense of responsibility.

The Committee have enlarged the preamble so as to include all parts of the announcement of the 20th August, 1917. Their reason for doing so is that an attempt has been made to distinguish between the parts of this announcement and to attach a different value to each part according to opinion. It has been said, for instance, that whereas the first part is a binding pledge, the later part is a mere expression of opinion of no importance. Bnt the Committee think that it is of the utmost importance, from the very inauguration of these constitutional changes, that Parliament should make it quite plain that the responsibility for the successive stages of the development of self-government in India rests on itself and on itself alone, and that it cannot share this responsibility with, much less delegate it to, the newly-elected legislatures of India.

They also desire to emphasize the wisdom and justice of and increasing association of Indians with every branch of the administration, but they wish to make it perfectly clear that His Majesty's Government must remain free to appoint Europeans to those posts for which they are specially required and qualified.

Part I.

Clause 1.—The Committee wish to take this opportunity of acknowledging the debt they owe to the work of the two Committees on Franchise and Functions presided over by Lord Southborough. If they are not able to accept all the conclusions of these Committees, and if they recommend some additional provisions to those included in those reports, it does not mean that they are not very sensible of the value of the work done, without which, indeed, this constitutional change could not have been effected.

The lists of central, provincial and transferred subjects included in the Functions Committee's report have been somewhat altered after consultation with the India Office (see Appendix F to the Minutes af Evidence) ; and as so amended they are accepted by this Committee, subject to certain general observations at the end of this Report. It must not, however, be concluded that these partitions of the functions of government are absolutely clear cut and mutually exclusive. They must in all cases be read with the reservations in the text of the Franchise Committee's report, and with due regard to the necessity for special procedure in cases where their orbits overlap.

The Committee have given much attention to the difficult question of the principle on which the provincial revenues and balances should be distributed between the two sides of the provincial Governments. They are confident that the problem can readily be solved by the simple process of common sense and reasonable give and take, but they are aware that this question might, in certain circumstances, become the cause of much friction in the provincial Government, and they are of opinion that the rules governing the allocation of these revenues and balances should be framed so as to make the existence of such friction impossible. They advise that, if the Governor, in the course of preparing either his first or any subsequent budget, finds that there is likely to be a serious or protracted difference of opinion between the executive council and his ministers on this subject, he should be empowered at once to make an allocation of revenue and balances between the reserved and transferred subjects, which should continue for at least the whole life of the existing legislative council. The Committee do not endorse the suggestion that certain sources of revenue should be allocated to reserved, and certain sources to transferred, subjects, but they recommend that the Governor should allocate a definite proportion of the revenue, say, by way of illustration two-thirds to reserved and one-third to transferred subjects, and similarly a proportion, though not necessarily the same fraction, of the balances. If the Governor desires assistance in making the allocation, he should be allowed at his discretion to refer the question to be decided to such authority as the Governor-General shall appoint. Further, the Committee are of opinion that it should be laid down from the first that, until an agreement which both sides of the Government will equally support has been reached, or until an allocation has been made by the Governor, the total provisions of the different expenditure heads in the budget of the province for the preceding financial year shall hold good.

The Committee desire that the relation of the two sides of the Government in this matter, as in all others, should be of such mutual sympathy that each will be able to assist and influence for the common good the work of the other, but not to exercise control over it. The budget should not be capable of being used as a means for enabling ministers or a majority of the legislative council to direct the policy of reserved subjects ; but on the other hand the executive council should be helpful to ministers in their desire to develop the departments entrusted to their care. On the Governor personally will devolve the task of holding the balance between the legitimate needs of both sets of his advisers.

Clause 2.—This clause has been inserted to regularise the raising of loans by local Governments on the special security of their own provincial revenues.

Clause 3.—The question has been raised as to the communications between the Governors of provinces and the Secretary of State. The question as to whether such communication shall in future take place, and as to the procedure to be adopted in them, may well be left to the Secretary of State. In the opinion of the Committee there is no cause at present for disturbing the existing position, except to the extent to which the Secretary of State relaxes his powers of direction and control over local governments. To that extent the Government of India will also withdraw from intervention ; but India is not yet ripe for a true federal system, and the central government cannot be relegated to functions of mere inspection and advice. The Committee trust that there will be an extensive delegation, statutory and otherwise, to provincial governments of some powers and duties now in the hands of the Government of India ; and they trust also that the control of that Government over provincial matters will be exercised with a view to preparing the provinces for the gradual transfer of power to the provincial Government and legislature.

Clause 4.—The Committee are of opinion that the ministers selected by the Governor to advise him on the transferred subjects should be elected members of the legislative council, enjoying its confidence and capable of leading it. A minister will have the option of resigning if his advice is not accepted by the Governor ; and the Governor will have the ordinary constitutional right of dismissing a minister whose policy he believes to be either seriously at fault or out of accord with the views of the legislative council. In the last resort the Governor can always dissolve his legislative council and choose new ministers after a fresh election ; but if this course is adopted the Committee hope that the Governor will find himself able to accept such views as his new ministers may press upon him regarding the issue which forced the dissolution. The Committee are of opinion that in no province will there be need for less than two ministers, while in some provinces more will be required. In these circumstances they think that it should be recognised from the commencement that ministers may be expected to act in concert together. They probably would do so ; and in the opinion of the Committee it is better that they should, and therefore that the fact should be recognised on the face of the Bill. They advise that the status of ministers should be similar to that of the members of the executive council, but that their salaries should be fixed by the legislative council. Later on in this Report it will be suggested that Indian members of the Council of India in London should be paid a higher scale of remuneration than those members of the council domiciled in the United Kingdom. The same principle might suggest to the legislative council that it was reasonable for the ministers of the provincial government domiciled in India to be paid on a lower scale of remuneration than the European members.

Provision has been made in this clause for the appointment, at the Governor's discretion, of non-official members of the legislative council to fill a role somewhat similar to that of the Parliamentary Under-Secretary in this country.

Clause 5.—The Committee are of opinion that the normal strength of an executive council, especially in the smaller provinces, need not exceed two members. They have not, however, reduced the existing statutory maximum of four ; but if in any case the council includes two members with service qualifications, neither of whom is by birth an Indian, they think that it should also include two unofficial Indian members.

Clause 6.—The Committee desire at this point to give a picture of the manner in which they think that, under this Bill, the government of a province should be worked. There will be many matters of administrative business, as in all countries, which can be disposed of departmentally, but there will remain a large category of business of the character which would naturally be the subject of Cabinet consultation. In regard to this last category the Committee conceive that the habit should be carefully fostered of joint deliberation between the members of the executive council and the ministers, sitting under the chairmanship of the Governor. There cannot be too much mutual advice and consultation on such subjects ; but the Committee attach the highest importance to the principle that, when once opinions have been freely exchanged and the last word has been said, there ought then to be no doubt whatever as to where the responsibility for the decision lies. Therefore, in the opinion of the Committee, after such consultation, and when it is clear that the decision lies within the jurisdiction of one or other half of the Government, that decision in respect of a reserved subject should be recorded separately by the executive council, and in respect of a transferred subject by the ministers, and all acts and proceedings of the Government should state in definite terms on whom the responsibility for the decision rests. It will not always, however, be clear, otherwise than in a purely departmental and technical fashion, with whom the jurisdiction lies in the case of questions of common interest. In such cases it will be inevitable for the Governor to occupy the position of informal arbitrator between the two parts of his administration ; and it will equally be his duty to see that a decision arrived at on one side of his Government is followed by such consequential action on the other side as may be necessary to make the policy effective and homogeneous.

The position of the Governor will thus be one of great responsibilty and difficulty, and also of great opportunity and honour. He may have to hold the balance between divergent policies and different ideals, and to prevent discord and friction. It will also be for him to help with sympathy and courage the popular side of his government in their new responsibilies. He should never hesitate to point out to ministers what he thinks is the right course or to warn them if he thinks they are taking the wrong course. But if, after hearing all the arguments, ministers should decide not to adopt his advice, then, in the opinion of the Committee, the Governor should ordinarily allow ministers to have their way, fixing the responsibility upon them, even if it may subsequently be necessary for him to veto any particular piece of legislation. It is not possible but that in India, as in all other countries, mistakes will be made by ministers, acting with the approval of a majority of the legislative council, but there is no way of learning except through experience and by the realisation of responsibility.

In the debates of the legislative council members of the executive council should act together and ministers should act together, but members of the executive council and ministers should not oppose each other by speech or vote ; members of the executive council should not be required to support, either by speech or vote, proposals of ministers of which they do not approve, nor should members be required to support by speech or vote proposals of the executive council of which they do not approve ; they should be free to speak and vote for each other's proposals when they are in agreement with them. All other official members of the legislative council should be free to speak and vote as they choose.

Clause. 7.—The Committee have altered the first schedule to the Bill, so as to show only the total stength of the legislative council in each province. They have retained the provision, now in sub-clause (2), that at least 70 per cent. of the members shall be elected, and not more than 20 per cent. shall be officials. This general stipulation will govern the distribution of the seats in each province; but in certain respects the detailed arrangements will require futher consideration, and proposals should be called for from the Government of India in regard to them. The points in question, as well as some disputable matters on which the Committee wish to endorse the proposals of the Franchise Committee's report, are dealt with in the following recommendations :—

(a) The Committee regard the number of seats allotted to the rural population, as distinct from the urban, as disproportionately low, and consider that it should receive a larger share of representation. They also think that an attempt should be made to secure better representation of the urban wage-earning class; and they are convinced that an effort should be made to remedy in part at least the present disparity between the size of the electorates in the different provinces. In all those matters no definite instructions need be given. The Government of India should be left a wide discretion in adjusting the figures, subject, however, to the understanding that the adjustment should be effected in all cases rather by enlargement than by diminution of the representation proposed in the Franchise Committee's report.

(b) The Committee are of opinion that the representation proposed for the depressed classes is inadequate. Within this definition are comprised, as shown in the report of the Franchise Committee, a large proportion of the whole population of India. They think that the Government of India should, as it advises, be instructed to give such classes a larger share of representation by nomination, regard being had to the numbers of depressed classes in each province, and after consultation with the Local Governments. This representation should, if necessary, be in addition to, but not in diminution of, the general electorate. Whenever possible, other persons than members of the Civil Services should be selected to represent the depressed classes, but if a member of those services, specially qualified for this purpose, has to be appointed, his nomination should not operate to increase the maximum ratio of official seats.

(c) In the Madras Presidency the Committee consider that the non-Brahmins must be provided with separate representation by means of the reservation of seats. The Brahmins and non-Brahmins should be invited to settle the matter by negotiation among themselves; and it would only be, if agreement cannot be reached in that way, that the decision should be referred to an arbitrator appointed for the purpose by the Government of India.

(d) The Committee would recommend that similar treatment be accorded to the Mahrattas in the Bombay Presidency.

(e) The question whether women should or should not be admitted to the franchise on the same terms as men should be left to the newly-elected legislative council of each province to settle by resolution. The Government of India should be instructed to make rules so that, if a legislative council so voted, women might be put upon the register of voters in that province. The Committee have not felt able to settle this question themselves, as urged by the majority of witnesses who appeared before them. It seems to them to go deep into the social system and susceptibilities of India, and, therefore, to be a question which can only, with any prudence, be settled in accordance with the wishes of Indians themselves as constitutionally expressed.

(f) The Committee are of opinion that the franchise as settled by the rules to be made under this Act should not be altered for the first ten years, and that it should at present be outside the power of the Legislative Councils to make any alteration in the franchise. The recommendation, therefore, in respect of woman suffrage, is to be regarded as altogether exceptional, and as not forming any precedent in respect of proposals for other alterations.

(g) The special representation of landholders in the provinces should be reconsidered by the Government of India in consultation with the local governments.

(h) The franchise for the University seats should be extended to all graduates of over seven years' standing.

(i) The Government of India should be instructed to consult with the Government of Bengal in respect of the representation of Europeans in Bengal. It appears to the Committee that there are good reasons for a re-adjustment of that representation. The recommendations of the report of the Franchise Committee in respect of European representation in other provinces may be accepted.

(j) The question whether the rulers and subjects of Indian States may be registered as electors or may be elected to the legislative councils should be left to be settled in each case by the local government of the province.

(k) The Committee are of opinion that dismissal from the service of the government in India should not be a disqualification for election, but that a criminal conviction entailing a sentence of more than six months' imprisonment should be a disqualification for five years from the date of the expiration of the sentence.

(l) The compromise suggested by the Franchise Committee in respect of the residential qualification of candidates for legislative councils, whereby the restriction was to be imposed only in the provinces of Bombay, the Punjab, and the Central Provinces, may be accepted.

(m) The recommendations of the Franchise Committee in respect of the proportionate representations of Mohammedans, based on the Lucknow compact, may be accepted.

Two further observations must be made on this question of franchise. It seems to the Committee that the principle of proportional representation may be found to be particularly applicable to the circumstances of India, and they recommend that this suggestion be fully explored, so that there may be material for consideration by the Statutory Commission when it sits at the end of ten years. Further, it has been strongly represented to the Committee, and the Committee are themselves firmly convinced, that a complete and stringent Corrupt Practices Act should be passed and brought into operation before the first elections for the legislative councils. There is no such Act at present in existence in India, and the Committee are convinced that it will not be less required in India than it is in other countries.

Clause 9.—The Committee have considered carefully the question who is to preside over the legislative councils in the provinces. They are of opinion that the Governor should not preside, and they advise that, for a period of four years, the President should be appointed by the Governor. Wherever possible it would be a great advantage if someone could be found for this purpose who had had parliamentary experience. The legislative council should itself elect a Vice-President, and at the end of four years the nominated President would disappear, and the President and Vice-President would be elected by the councils. The Committee attribute the greatest importance to this question of the Presidency of the legislative council. It will, in their opinion, conduce very greatly to the successful working of the new councils if they are imbued from the commencement with the spirit and conventions of parliamentary procedure as developed in the Imperial Parliament. The Committee will recur to this subject in dealing with the question of the President of the Legislative Assembly of India.

Clause 11.—The Committee think that the provincial Budget should be submitted to the vote of the Legislative Council, subject to the exemption from this process of certain charges of a special or recurring character which have been set out in the Bill. In cases where the Council alter the provision for a transferred subject, the Committee consider that the Governor would be justified, if so advised by his Ministers, in re-submitting the provision to the Council for a review of their former decision; but they do not apprehend that any statutory prescription to that effect is required. Where the Council have reduced a provision for a reserved subject which the Governor considers essential to the proper administration of the subject concerned, he will have a power of restoration. The Committee wish it to be perfectly clear that this power is real and that its exercise should not be regarded as unusual or arbitrary; unless the Governor has the right to secure supply for those services for which he remains responsible to Parliament, that responsibility cannot justly be fastened upon him.

Whenever the necessity for new taxation arises, as arise it must, the questions involved should be thrashed out by both parts of the Government in consultation together, and it is especially important that in this matter both parts of the Government should, if possible, be in agreement when the proposals of the Government are laid before the Legislature.

Clause 13.—The Committee have rejected the plan of Grand Committees as drafted originally in the Bill. They have done so because in their opinion the Grand Committee did not give the Governor the power of securing legislation in a crisis in respect of those matters for which he is held responsible, and because in respect of ordinary legislation about reserved subjects it perpetuated the system of securing legislation by what is known as the "official bloc," which has been the cause of great friction and heartburning. The responsibility for legislation on reserved subjects is with the Governor in Council, and, when the "official bloc" has been put into operation, it has been put into operation by him. and is merely an indirect way of asserting his responsibility The Committee think it much better that there should be no attempt to conceal the fact that the responsibility is with the Governor in Council, and they recommend a process by which the Governor should be empowered to pass an Act in respect of any reserved subject, if he considers that the Act is necessary for the proper fulfilment of his responsibility to Parliament. He should not do so until he has given every opportunity for the matter to be thoroughly discussed in the Legislative Council, and as a sensible man, he should, of course, endeavour to carry the Legislative Council with him in the matter by the strength of his case. But, if he finds that cannot be so, then he should have the power to proceed on his own responsibility. Acts passed on his sole responsibility should be reserved by the Governor-General for His Majesty's pleasure, and be laid before Parliament. His Majesty will necessarily be advised by the Secretary of State for India, and the responsibility for the advice to be given to His Majesty can only rest with the Secretary of State. But the Committee suggest that the Standing Committee of Parliament, whose appointment they have advised, should be specially consulted about Acts of this character. Provision, however, is made in the Bill for the avoidance of delay in case of a grave emergency by giving the Governor-General power to assent to the Act without reserving it, though this of course would prevent subsequent disallowance by His Majesty in Council.

Clause 15.—The Committee have two observations to make on the working of this Clause. On the one hand they do not think that any change in the boundaries of a province should be made without due consideration of the views of the Legislative Council of the province. On the other hand, they are of opinion that any clear request made by a majority of the members of a Legislative Council representing a distinctive racial or linguistic territorial unit for its constitution under this Clause as a sub-province or a separate province should be taken as a prima facie case on the strength of which a commission of inquiry might be appointed by the Secretary of State, and that it should not be a bar to the appointment of such a commission of inquiry that the majority of the Legislative Council of the province in question is opposed to the request of the minority representing such a distinctive territorial unit.

PART II.

Clause 18.—As will be explained below, the Committee do not accept the device, in the Bill as drafted, of carrying government measures through the Council of State without reference to the Legislative Assembly, in cases where the latter body cannot be got to assent to a law which the Governor-General considers essential. Under the scheme which the Committee propose to substitute for this procedure there is no necessity to retain the Council of State as an organ for government legislation. It should therefore be reconstituted from the commencement as a true Second Chamber. They recommend that it should consist of sixty members, of whom not more than twenty should be official members. The Franchise Committee advise that the non-official members should be elected by the same group of persons as elect the members of the Legislative Assembly and in the same constituencies. This is a plan which the Committee could in no circumstances accept. They hope and believe that a different system of election for the Council of State can be devised by the time the constitution embodied in this Bill comes into operation, and they recommend that the Government of India be enjoined forthwith to make suggestions accordingly, to which effect can be given without delaying the inauguration of the new constitution. If the advice of the Committee that it be re-appointed for the purpose of considering the rules to be framed under this Bill be approved, it should have an opportunity of considering the proposals made for the election of the Council of State.

Clause 19.—For the Legislative Assembly the Committee are equally unwilling to accept, as a permanent arrangement, the method of indirect election proposed in the report of the Franchise Committee. If by no other course it were possible to avoid delay in bringing the constitution enacted by the Bill into operation, the Committee would acquiesce in that method for a preliminary period of three years. But they are not convinced that delay would be involved in preparing a better scheme of direct election, and they endorse the views expressed by the Government of India in paragraph 39 of its despatch dealing with the subject. They accordingly advise that the Government of India be instructed at once to make recommendations to this effect at the earliest possible moment. These recommendations as embodied in draft rules would also be subject to examination by this Committee if re-appointed.

Clause 20.—The Committee think that the President of the Legislative Assembly should for four years be a person appointed by the Governor-General. He should be qualified by experience in the House of Commons and a knowledge of parliamentary procedure, precedents and conventions. He should be the guide and adviser of the Presidents of the provincial councils, and he should be chosen with a view to the influence which it is hoped he would have on the whole history of parliamentary procedure in India. He should be paid an adequate salary.

Clause 25.—This is a new provision for the submission of the Indian Budget to the vote of the Legislative Assembly, on the understanding that this body is constituted as a chamber reasonably representative in character and elected directly by suitable constituencies. The Committee consider it necessary (as suggested to them by the consolidated fund charges in the Imperial Parliament) to exempt certain charges of a special or recurring nature, which have been set out in the Bill, e.g., the cost of defence, the debt charges and certain fixed salaries, from the process of being voted. But otherwise they would leave the Assembly free to criticise and vote the estimates of expenditure of the Government of India. It is not, however, within the scheme of the Bill to introduce at the present stage any measure of responsible government into the central administration, and a power must be reserved to the Governor-General in Council of treating as sanctioned any expenditure which the Assembly may have refused to vote if he considers the expenditure to be necessary for the fulfilment of his responsibilities for the good government of the country. It should be understood from the beginning that this power of the Governor-General in Council is real, and that it is meant to be used if and whenever necessary.

Clause 26.—For reasons which prompted the rejection of the process of certification by a Governor to a grand committee in a province, the Committee are opposed to the proposals in the Bill which would have enabled the Governor-General to refer to the Council of State, and to obtain by virtue of his official majority in that body any legislation which the lower chamber refuse to accept, but which he regarded as essential to the discharge of his duties. The Committee have no hesitation in accepting the view that the Governor-General in Council should in all circumstances be fully empowered to secure legislation which is required for the discharge of his responsibilities; but they think it is unworthy that such responsibility should be concealed through the action of a Council of State specially devised in its composition to secure the necessary powers. They believe that in such a case it would add strength to the Government of India to act before the world on its own responsibility. In order, however, that Parliament may be fully apprised of the position and of the considerations which led to this exeeptional procedure, they advise that all Acts passed in this manner should be laid before Parliament, who would naturally consider the opinion of the standing committee already referred to.

Clause 28.—The recommendation of the Committee is that the present limitation on the number of the members of the Governor-General's Executive Council should be removed, that three members of that Council should continue to be public servants or ex-public servants who have had not less than ten years' experience in the service of the Crown in India; that one member of the Council should have definite legal qualifications, but that those qualifications may be gained in India as well as in the United Kingdom; and that not less than three members of the Council should be Indians. In this connection it must be borne in mind that the members of the Council drawn from the ranks of the public servants will, as time goes on, be more and more likely to be of Indian rather than of European extraction.

Clause 29.—The Committee have inserted this provision to allow of the selection of members of the Legislature who will be able to undertake duties similar to those of the Parliamentary Under-Secretaries in this country. It should be entirely at the discretion of the Governor-General to say to which departments these officers should be attached, and to define the scope of their duties.

Part III.

Clause 30.—The Committee think that all charges of the India Office, not being "agency" charges should be paid out of moneys to be provided by Parliament.

Clause 31.—The Committee are not in favour of the abolition of the Council of India. They think that, at any rate for some time to come, it will be absolutely necessary that the Secretary of State should be advised by persons of Indian experience, and they are convinced that, if no such Council existed, the Secretary of State would have to form an informal one if not a formal one. Therefore, they think it much better to continue a body which has all the advantages behind it of tradition and authority, although they would not debar the readjustment of its work so as to make it possible to introduce what is known as the portfolio system. They think, also, that its constitution may advantageously be modified by the introduction of more Indians into it and by shortening of the period of the service upon it, in order to ensure a continuous flow of fresh experience from India and to relieve Indian members from the necessity of spending so long a period as seven years in England.

Clause 33.—The Committee have given most careful consideration to the relations of the Secretary of State with the Government of India, and through it with the provincial governments. In the relations of the Secretary of State with the Governor-General in Council the Committee are not of opinion that any statutory change can be made, so long as the Governor-General remains responsible to Parliament, but in practice the conventions which now govern these relations may wisely be modified to meet fresh circumstances caused by the creation of a Legislative Assembly with a large elected majority. In the exercise of his responsibility to Parliament, which he cannot delegate to anyone else, the Secretary of State may reasonably consider that only in exceptional circumstances should he be called upon to intervene in matters of purely Indian interest where the Government and the Legislature of India are in agreement.

This examination of the general proposition leads inevitably to the consideration of one special case of non-intervention. Nothing is more likely to endanger the good relations between India and Great Britain than a belief that India's fiscal policy is dictated from Whitehall in the interests of the trade of Great Britain. That such a belief exists at the moment there can be no doubt. That there ought to be no room for it in the future is equally clear. India's position in the Imperial Conference opened the door to negotiation between India and the rest of the Empire, but negotiation without power to legislate is likely to remain ineffective. A satisfactory solution of the question can only be guaranteed by the grant of liberty to the Government of India to devise those tariff arrangements which seem best fitted to India's needs as an integral portion of the British Empire. It cannot be guaranteed by statute without limiting the ultimate power of Parliament to control the administration of India, and without limiting the power of veto which rests in the Crown; and neither of these limitations finds a place in any of the Statutes in the British Empire. It can only therefore be assured by an acknowledgment of a convention. Whatever be the right fiscal policy for India, for the needs of her consumers as well as for her manufacturers, it is quite clear that she should have the same liberty to consider her interests as Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand, Canada and South Africa. In the opinion of the Committee, therefore, the Secretary of State should as far as possible avoid interference on this subject when the Government of India and its Legislature are in agreement, and they think that his intervention, when it does take place, should be limited to safeguarding the international obligations of the Empire or any fiscal arrangements within the Empire to which His Majesty's Government is a party.

The relations of the Secretary of State and of the Government of India with provincial governments should, in the Committee's judgment, be regulated by similar principles, so far as the reserved subjects are concerned. It follows, therefore, that in purely provincial matters which are reserved, where the provincial government and legislature are in agreement, their view should ordinarily be allowed to prevail, though it is necessary to bear in mind the fact that some reserved subjects do cover matters in which the central government is closely concerned. Over transferred subjects, on the other hand, the control of the Governor-General in Council, and thus of the Secretary of State, should be restricted in future within the narrowest possible limits, which will be defined by rules under sub-clause 3 of Clause 1 of the Bill.

Rules under this clause will be subsidiary legislation of sufficient moment to justify their being brought especially to the notice of Parliament. The Secretary of State might conveniently discuss them with the Standing Committee whose creation has been recommended in this Report; and Parliament would no doubt consider the opinion of this body when the rules come, as it is proposed that they should do, for acceptance by positive resolution in both Houses. The same procedure is recommended by the Committee for adoption in the case of rules of special or novel importance under other clauses of the Bill. It must be for the Secretary of State to decide which of the many rules that will fall to be drafted by the Government of India can be sufficiently dealt with by the ordinary process of lying on the table of Parliament for a certain number of days. In deciding this point, however, he may naturally have recourse to the advice of the Standing Committee, should it happen to be in session, and obtain their assistance in determining which rules deserve to be made the subject of the more formal procedure by positive resolution.

Clause 35.—This clause carries out the recommendation of Lord Crewe's Committee to appoint a High Commissioner for India, to be paid out of Indian revenues, who will perform for India functions of agency, as distinguished from political functions, analogous to those now performed in the offices of the High Commissioners of the Dominions.

Part IV.

Clause 36.—The Committee do not conceal from themselves that the position of the public services in working the new constitutions in the provinces will, in certain circumstances, be difficult. They are of opinion that these services have deserved the admiration and gratitude of the whole Empire. They know that some members of the services regard the wisdom of the proposed changes with grave misgiving, and that some fear that those changes will not tend to the welfare of the Indian masses. They are convinced, however, that the services will accept the changing conditions and the inevitable alteration in their own position, and devote themselves in all loyalty to making a success, so far as in them lies, of the new constitution.

In the provinces officers serving in a reserved department will be controlled by the Governor in Council, and in a transferred department by the Governor acting with Ministers, but in both cases alike the personal concurrence of the Governor should be regarded as essential in the case of all orders of any importance prejudicially affecting the position or prospects of officers appointed by the Secretary of State.

The Committte think that every precaution should be taken to secure to the public servants the career in life to which they looked forward when they were recruited, and they have introduced fresh provisions into this clause to that end. If friction occurs, a re-adjustment of persons and places may often get over the difficulty, and the Governor must always regard it as one of his most important duties to establish a complete understanding between his Ministers and the officers through whom they will have to work. But if there are members of the service whose doubts as to the changes to be made are so deeply rooted that they feel they cannot usefully endeavour to take part in them, then the Committee think it would only be fair to those officers that they should be offered an equivalent career elsewhere, if it is in the power of His Majesty's Government to do so, or, in the last resort, that they should be allowed to retire on such pension as the Secretary of State in Council may considered suitable to their period of service.

PART V.

Clause 41.—The Committee are of opinion that the Statutory Commission should not be appointed until the expiration of ten years, and that no changes of substance in the constitution, whether in the franchise or in the lists of reserved and transferred subjects or otherwise, should be made in the interval. The Commission will be fully empowered to examine the working of the constitutions in all their details in the provinces, and to advise whether the time has come for full responsible government in each province, or in the alternative whether and to what extent the powers of self-government already granted should be extended, or modified, or restricted. It should be clearly understood, also, that the Commission should be empowered to examine into the working of the Government of India and to advise in respect of the Government of India no less than in respect of the provincial governments.

8. This concludes the Committee's specific recommendations of the Bill. There remain certain other topics which do not conveniently fall within any particular clause. The first of these is the treatment of Burma, and after hearing evidence the Committee have not advised that Burma should be included within the scheme. They do not doubt but that the Burmese have deserved and should receive a constitution analogous to that provided in this Bill for their Indian fellow-subjects. But Burma is only by accident part of the responsibility of the Governor-General of India. The Burmese are as distinct from the Indians in race and language as they are from the British.

9. Doubts have been expressed from several quarters questioning the financial adjustment proposed between the Central and Provincial Governments in India. Without expressing any opinion on this controversy, the Committee accept and endorse the recommendation of the Government of India that a fully qualified financial commission should be appointed to advise as to the principle on which contributions from the Provincial Governments to the Central Government should in future be adjusted.

10. The Committee think that it may often greatly assist the political education of India if standing committees of the legislative bodies are attached to certain departments of Government, but they only express this opinion on the understanding that the appointment of such committees, their composition, and the regulations which govern their precedure, shall be matters wholly and exclusively within the discretion of the Governor-General or of the Governor as the case may be.

11. The Committee are impressed by the objections raised by many witnesses to the manner in which certain classes of taxation can be laid upon the people of India by executive action without, in some cases, any statutory limitation of the rates and, in other cases, any adequate prescription by statute of the methods of assessment. They consider that the imposition of new burdens should be gradually brought more within the purview of the Legislature. And in particular, without expressing any judgment on the question whether the land revenue is a rent or tax, they advise that the process of revising the land revenue assessments ought to be brought under closer regulation by statute as soon as possible. At present the statutory basis for charging revenue on the land varies in different Provinces ; but in some at least the pitch of assessment is entirely at the discretion of the Executive Government. No branch of the administration is regulated with greater elaboration or care : but the people who are most affected have no voice in the shaping of the system, and the rules are often obscure and imperfectly understood by those who pay the revenue. The Committee are of opinion that the time has come to embody in the law the main principles by which the land revenue is determined, the methods of valuation, the pitch of assessment, the periods of revision, the graduation of enhancements, and the other chief processes which touch the well-being of the revenue payers. The subject is one which probably would not be transferred to ministers until the electorate included a satisfactory representation of rural interests, those of the tenantry as well as of the landlords ; and the system should be established on a clear statutory basis before this change takes place.

12. The Committee have not hitherto touched on the subject of education in India, and it is far too large for them to make any attempt to deal with it adequately. They have accepted the recommendation of the Functions Committee that, subject to certain reservations about the Universities, the responsibility for the whole field of education in each province should be transferred to ministers. They attach much importance, however, to the educational advancement of the depressed and backward classes, and they trust that the subject will receive special attention from ministers. They are also impressed by the advantage of Boards, such as Sir Michael Sadler has advised in Bengal, for the assistance of ministers in controlling the different grades of education, and they trust that ministers will see their way from the outset to constitute such Boards in every province. The Committee would similarly commend to ministers the advisability of creating local government departments in the provinces

13. The Committee attach the greatest importance to the formation in each Provincial Government of a strong department of Finance which will serve both sides of the Government alike.

14. The Committee have been greatly struck by the earnest representations made to them by several witnesses, both of British and Indian birth, to the effect that the Government of India and the provincial governments must become more vocal, and put forth their view of what the good of India requires with more courage and more persistence than they have in the past. It has been represented to them that it will be of the utmost importance in the future that the Government of India and the provincial governments should have means of explaining to the people of India the reasons why things are done, the reasons which underlie decisions, and the arguments against proposals which they consider will be detrimental to the welfare of the country. It was represented to the Committee that at present, to a great extent, the case for the policy of the Government of India and of the provincial governments is unknown to the masses of Indians, whereas the case against that policy is becoming every day more widely disseminated by means of the vernacular Press. They are glad to think that this opinion is also shared by the Secretary of State for India and the Viceroy. It is dealt with in paragraph 326 of their Report on Indian Constitutional Reforms.

15. In conclusion the Committee emphatically repudiate the suggestion that the changes in this Bill in the form of the provincial governments of India imply any condemnation of the present system of government in India. The Government of India has accomplished great things for India's good and one of its greatest services has been the introduction into India of a reign of law, to which the Government itself is as much subject as the people it governs. It is no reproach to it that in form it has been everywhere autocratic. So long as Parliament on the one hand did not bestow any form of constitutional self-government on any part of India, and on the other hand held the Government of India rigidly responsible to itself for its every action, it could not be otherwise in the provinces any more than at the central seat of government. But, whatever the form, the spirit of its being everywhere and always has been effort for the welfare of the masses of the people of India.

16. The Committee have directed the Minutes of Proceedings, together with Appendices, to be laid before both Houses of Parliament.

The said Draft Report is read and considered.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE EARL OF SELBORNE IN THE CHAIR.

Chairman.] I wish to state on behalf of the Committee to the Press and the public that there will be an official report of the evidence, and that will be the only accurate and authorised copy. If any representative bodies wish copies of that authorised edition of the evidence to be furnished to them they should make an application to the Clerk of this Committee, and I will decide as Chairman whether that copy should be given. I may say that it will be given to any really representative people.

SIR JAMES MESTON, K.C.S.I., is called in; and Examined as follows:—

Chairman.

1. You are Finance Member of the Government of India?—Yes.

2. The opinions of the Government of India are recorded in the memoranda and letters of the Governor-General in Council?—Yes.

3. And, of course, those are the only expressions of opinion of the Government of India which we can recognise. You are here to answer any questions as to the meaning of that opinion, and to elucidate any points which may not be clear to us?—Yes.

4. When we have done with the Government of India we shall be prepared to hear your private opinion as an Indian Civil Servant of great distinction and experience, but at the present moment we are only going to ask you questions in elucidation of the views expressed officially by the Government of India. Will you, in the first instance, explain to the Committee as briefly as you can the attitude taken by the Government of India in the documents to which I have referred towards the policy embodied in the Government of India Bill, and when you have done that will you kindly explain to us what the amendments are which the Government of India suggest in this Bill and the reasons for those amendments?—The views of the Government of India have been expressed in a series of ten despatches, and it is the intention of the Government of India still further to develop the picture by submitting to the Secretary of State drafts of regulations, of subsidiary legislation which they may have to undertake themselves and of descriptions of procedure which will be necessary to complete as a working scheme the policy of the Bill. The Government of India have asked me to express to this Committee, with the Secretary of State's permission, their very great appreciation of the gravity and magnitude of their own responsibility in the matter. They feel that it is almost impossible to exaggerate the vastness of the experiment of creating for the first time in history a democracy in a great Eastern country, and consequently they make no apology for the apparently inordinate length at which they have set forth their views and their picture of the details of the scheme. What they endeavoured to do was to take every responsible scheme that has been so far placed before them and to try to work it out in detail with their own special knowledge of the material with which it would have to be constructed and the environment in which it would have to start its operations. That is exactly how they treated the Joint Report of the Secretary of State and the Viceroy. They treated it as a draft. They believe that they had an invitation from both the authors of the Report, and they accepted that invitation to examine it critically, to subject it to every possible scrutiny that their experience suggested, and, if possible, to improve it. They tried to picture the scheme in its daily working in future, and they tried to gauge the feelings, the prejudices, if you like—of those who would participate in its working from the outset. They tried to map out the dangers to which the scheme would be likely to be exposed, and they tried to suggest measures for getting round those dangers.

In their despatches, and in the subsidiary papers which I have brought home, we have endeavoured to paint a complete picture, and in doing so it was almost inevitable that we should get away in some respects from the details of the original sketch. I might put it in another way. We took the Report as, so to speak, an architectural drawing, the frontal elevation of some great building, and we tried to translate this into a working plan from which the builders could construct the building with the materials which they knew were at hand, and provide for the needs of those who were going to occupy it. In constructing this working plan we found inevitably certain matters in which the original elevation had to be modified, and it is these modifications that I have been asked to place before the Secretary of State and this Committee. If I am not going beyond the terms of your question, I should like to emphasise, and I have been asked to emphasise, one more point. The Government of India have done nothing more than this: They applied similar tests to every responsible scheme that came before them, and they found that the application of those tests meant the rejection of all the alternative schemes. They are thus in absolutely whole-hearted accord with the policy embodied in the Bill. They accept every vital principle to which the Bill gives effect. There is no difference of opinion in regard to this.

One further point which I have been asked to submit, with reference more directly to criticisms which have been addressed to the Government of India's Despatches, is that they have not consciously endeavoured to whittle away the scheme in any respect whatsoever. They set to work with no primary intention of either enlarging or diminishing the generosity of the scheme. Their sole idea, their sole ambition, was to develop the scheme into an effective working plan. If it does seem to some critics that they have diminished the generosity of it, I think it will be found that that is very largely due to unrealisable hopes that were built upon the original project. However that may be, the sole endeavour of the Government of India has been to show how they can make this scheme a success, and how they can get over the dangers which they foresee in its working. That, briefly speaking, is the attitude of the Government of India.

5. Having made that position clear, will you proceed to deal with the variations in the scheme now suggested by the Government of India?—There are two classes of variations. There are variations in regard to matters which, if the Bill becomes law as it now stands, will be the subject of rules and regulations, and in regard to them there are a number of minute, or, at least, minor, details upon which the Government of India would like to see departures from what was indicated in the Joint Report. The second class of variations would be alterations which the Government of India would propose in the text of the Bill as it now stands. Do you wish me to address myself to the latter?

6. The latter first and then the rules?—Shall I take the Bill clause by clause?

7. If you please?—The first point in reference to the actual text of the Bill occurs in Clause 4. In Clause 4 it is now proposed that in a Provincial Executive Council only one member, instead of at present two, should have had previous experience of service in India. The Government of India, while accepting this as a general rule, would prefer to see a second official member of Council attached in the event of the Governor being a stranger to India.

The second point is Clause 6. Clause 6 would have the effect of fixing, subject to the five per cent. marginal variation in proviso (a), the number and the details of the constitution of the Provincial Legislative Councils. The Government of India would prefer to leave at least the details to rules which would subsequently be made under the Act. They accept the provision of the maximum total strength of the Councils, but they would like more liberty, more time, to consider the detailed constitution. I may say that they have no intention of going behind the principle of the large elected majority, but their views as to the electorate and the constitution proposed in Lord Southborough's Committee's Report have not yet been finally reached. They think that the subject requires more ventilation, and they would like to postpone, until rules come to be framed, the details which are now given in the first schedule.

In Clause 8 there is very little difference of opinion, and it is very largely formal, but in Sub-Clause (3) Item (f) the principle is embodied of making a number of provincial subjects amenable to Indian legislation. The Government of India doubt whether this is the best way of effecting the control which they agree will have to be exercised over certain subjects, more particularly the transferred subjects. They are inclined to think that in regard to transferred subjects the preferable procedure would be to have a schedule or list of Indian Acts which are permanent, and may not be varied by the provincial legislatures. They are a little apprehensive that this wide power of subjecting provincial subjects to Indian legislation may be regarded as going further than the intentions of the framers of the Report. The difference, however, is more formal than substantial. A still more important matter in the same sub-clause is that it omits wholly an important provision in the present law. If you refer to Section 79 of the Government of India Act. Item (e) of Sub-Section 3 you will see that the local legislature at present has to get previous sanction before it can deal with any measure affecting the religion or religious rites and usages of any class of British subjects in India. What we felt about this was that although admittedly the present law has been regarded as hampering social development in India, it is still necessary to retain a central control over the personal law of Hindoos and Mohammedans. We think it is extremely desirable that provinces should be at liberty to deal with such matters as religious charities, which at present are liable to very grave abuse, and social reforms of any sort almost which do not affect the structure of the personal law of the two great communities. The personal law of Hindoos and Mohammedans is a matter which transcends all provinces. The Hindoo, who is subject to the law of succession prevailing in Guierat, may come and live in Benares and still be amenable to that law, and we are a little apprehensive that any provincial experiments tampering with those provisions would be dangerous and resented. Consequently, we should like to retain in Clause 8 (3) of the Bill a general provision safeguarding the essential features of Hindoo and Mohammedan law. This is not an attempt at drafting, but the sub-clause that we proposed is "affecting any general principle of Hindoo or Mohammedan law." I do not know whether you want me to develop the argument for these modifications or simply to state them.

8. No, simply state them?—In Clause 9 we come to the first real difference of substance. Clause 9, Sub-Clause (2), is drawn in accordance with the proposals of the Report for the financial relations between the two halves of the Provincial Government. I need not repeat those proposals, but the Government of India wish to enter a very strong plea for a clearer demarcation between the financial resources, duties and responsibilities of the official Government on the one hand and the popular Government on the other, than is here proposed. It is a very long story, but the controversy between what has been called the Joint Purse and the Separate Purse is one in which I should be very glad to help the Committee at any time when they require it.

9. You must make that case fully?—Now?

10. Yes?—The proposals in the Report contemplate a single pool into which the whole of the revenues of a province are poured. From that pool every year, at the time of the preparation of the Provincial Budget, the two halves of the Government will meet and endeavour to draw the funds which they require for carrying on the work of the coming year. If there is a struggle for the funds, the Governor will endeavour to compose the differences, and the result will be incorporated in the Provincial Budget which goes before the Council. The Legislative Council will then proceed to deal with all the provisions in the Bill—only the expenditure provisions; there is no reference to the Budget arrangements of revenue. The Council will be empowered to reduce any expenditure provisions, and if the estimate which they have reduced is an estimate affecting a reserved subject, and the Governor is of opinion that he cannot carry on the reserved subject with the reduced funds proposed by the Council, he will be empowered to restore the original estimate and to treat it as if it had been passed by the Council. I may say parenthetically that up to the time I left India the Government of India had not fully appreciated the form in which Sub-Clause (2) is drawn. The original draft, I think, was, to some extent, different. The Secretary of State had telegraphed the changes which were being proposed, but the telegrams were habitually mutilated, and several of the points which are emphasised in the Government of India's despatches, especially those of an earlier date, had reference to an earlier draft, and I find myself in a position of a little difficulty, although I think I can get over it, in putting what I believe would be the views of the Government of India upon what is now before the Committee That is, however, a parenthesis. The broad principle stands out that the Government of India dislike the common pool They believe that if the Dual Provincial Government is to be accepted it depends to a very considerable measure for its harmonious and successful working upon a clearer demarcation of the financial resources of the two halves of the Provincial Government. Put very briefly, what they propose is that each half of the Government should have unfettered control over the revenues from its own Departments. If the revenues from the Departments managed by the official half of the Government are insufficient for their normal requirements, they would be adjusted by a transfer, a subsidy if you like to call it so, or an assignment as we call it in India, from the resources at the disposal of the popular half of the Government; and vice versâ. That assignment might take the form either of a share of some head of revenue belonging to a Department under the Provincial Government, or if this is found objectionable, it might take the form of a fixed cash provision rising probably year by year in some fixed proportion so as to allow for the development of expenditure. But what we suggest is that it is of the highest importance that any arrangement of this sort should be made for a period of years, that we should avoid what we believe would be fatal to the harmony of the scheme, the annual wrangle of the two halves of the Government over their Budget, two dippers plunging into this pool and clashing with each other.

The main considerations which have weighed with the Government of India in pressing for this very important modification of the scheme in the Report, and, I think, clearly intended to be embodied in the Bill, are at least five. The first is the very obvious one that separate revenues, with separate power over their own revenues, form a tremendous stimulus to the half of the Government concerned, to develop its own resources. Under the joint purse what we fear is that neither half will feel directly the responsibility for making the best of its own revenues. It may be subjected to temptation to diminish revenue; it may be the subject of fads, if you like; and it may give away revenue with a happy sort of feeling that it does not very much matter, because, after all, the pool is there, and if they are not putting quite so much into it as they used to do, or as their critics think they might do, anyhow, the other half are putting in all the funds which may be required. And we do believe that the actual personal responsibility, so to speak, for the results of revenue administration are just as important a factor in administrative training as the responsibility for expenditure.

The second reason that weighed with the Government of India was that a joint purse involves a very considerable degree of temptation to meddle with each others' affairs. We believe, rightly or wrongly, that the success of this scheme will very largely depend on a clear demarcation of the duty which each half of the Government is going to undertake. We believe that it is only by marking down each man's job and making him stick to it, and making him stand by the results, that we will train the new Popular Government in its duties, and that we will make the new Popular Government able to show the proof of its capacity for further confidence. That will be very largely infringed, we fear, by the principle of the joint purse. Let me take an example. Supposing you have, as you undoubtedly will have, excise made a transferred subject. The natural and inevitable course of the policy of Ministers in realing with excise will be to press more and more for prohibition. They believe, rightly or wrongly, that our excise policy has encouraged intemperance among certain classes, and they are committed, deeply committed, to breaking down that policy and to reducing very largely the facilities for intoxicants. Now, as long as there is a joint pool, and the official Government see the trickle of excise revenue, which is a very substantial thing in some provinces, getting less and less there will be a serious tendency for them to come in and remonstrate, and say, "It is all very well, but in your zeal for temperance your are killing your revenue without producing the results you wish." That is what I mean by meddlesomeness. Take the police. There is a rooted conviction among classes of Indian politicians that we are extravagant over our police, and there will be a tendency to press us in every possible way to reduce our charges for police. This affects expenditure, but when I talk about the separate purse, I include revenue and expenditure. There again, you have a temptation to meddlesomeness. In many of the documents which one reads about this and other subjects, there is a sort of easy going assumption that all these fears that we entertain will mean really nothing, because you are going to start this great experiment in a temper of good sense, an intention and determination on both sides to make the best of it. If that were so then I should not have a word to say—the Government of India would not wish to say a word—but the Government of India are apprehensive about the state of feeling under which this thing is going to start. At the present moment feeling runs high. There will be during the initial stages of this new regime much misunderstanding and many oportunities for conflict, and we do feel that we ought to diminish these as far as possible.

Then the third, and almost the gravest, of all the difficulties about the joint purse is the friction that it must produce. We are constantly being told that the friction of a three-yearly, or five-yearly, or seven-yearly settlement of revenue as between the two halves of the Government, will be just as great as the annual friction over the distribution of the funds in the preparation of the Budget. That, I think, is an absolutely untenable proposition. The friction over the annual distribution of resources will begin in an Indian province about November, when the estimates of the various Departments come into the Finance Department. It will then be immediately apparent that one half or the other of the Government is working for a great deal more than it has any chance of getting. That, if everybody were on friendly terms, would be a matter of relative unimportance, but suppose there is a desperate enthusiasm on the part of each half to get the funds that it wants for its own particular purposes, this feeling, starting in November, will grow very acute until the time that the Governor has to come in and compose it. It is an extraordinarily difficult task for the Governor, and he may fail. If he fails the friction is carried into the Legislative Council when it deals with the Budget. The Legislative Council cuts down one side or the other side; fierce opposition is manifested by the side which has suffered, and, really, till the Budget is finally passed, about April, there is no peace. Now what we feel is that the cumulative effect of this wrangle going on for five months every year must be infinitely greater than any dissatisfaction that may be felt as regards a settlement made, we hope by an impartial body, once in three, five, or seven years. It is just this sort of friction over funds which may seriously imperil the harmonious working of the Council and of the Ministers with their official colleagues. We would do anything we can to remove avoidable points of friction, because we believe that is the greatest danger under the system which the Bill incorporates.

The fourth point is a more detailed and practical one probably, at least it is a more technical one. Anyone who has been Financial Secretary to a province knows perfectly well that the schemes which come in for his consideration right through the year, at all times, are very often schemes which do not necessarily restrict themselves to the Budget provisions for the coming year. Take almost anything that we have to deal with—an increase in our magistracy, which runs over a considerable period; an increase in scales of pay of our civil courts, which are at present underpaid; that runs over years. I am talking about the subordinate courts, munsiffs, and persons of that sort. A scheme for bridging rivers and laying out main roads runs for years; a scheme for improving our police buildings and our court houses, which, in some provinces are an absolute scandal; all these must run for years, and the Finance Department, if it is going to deal intelligently with any scheme of that sort, has to look far beyond the Budget provisions of the next twelve months. It has got to get into its mind, and it has in its mind, a general idea of the expansive capacity of its revenues; it is on the basis of that idea that it commits itself to schemes of continuous recurring expenditure. Now, our point is that unless we know definitely what are to be our resources it is impossible for us to maintain in our minds any estimate of future resources available for this class of work. It sounds technical, but it is a very practical point, and the Government of India feel that under the joint purse system it would be practically impossible for the Finance Department of the province to commit itself to important schemes involving recurring and growing expenditure.

The fifth and last argument which weighed with the Government of India is not wholely financial; it is partly political. It is based on the very exaggerated hopes which have been framed in India by certain perfectly responsible gentlemen, men who will have to play an important part in the inception of the new regime, as to the effect of the joint purse. If you will permit me, I shall illustrate this in the briefest possible manner by referring to certain phrases in a memorandum that has been put forward by a number of very eminent Indian gentlemen of the more moderate school of politics. It is a memorandum by Sir Dinshaw Wacha and Sir Naravan Chandravarkar, and so on. I will hand this in. It is an Appendix to the first Despatch of the Government of India. In the course of this memorandum, in paragraph 11, the writers say this: They are talking about financial control, and they are arguing in effect that the financial control which this scheme gives is very much what was hoped for—very much more than it looks on the surface. What they say is this: "The Ministers will naturally, in their own interests, exercise a jealous and vigilant control over the expenditure on reserved subjects in order that the transferred subjects may get as large an allotment as possible, so as to obviate the necessity or reduce the extent of additional taxation, which they honestly think could be avoided." At the end of the same paragraph they say: "The result in practice, therefore, is bound to be an effective control by the Legislature for all practical purposes of nearly the whole of the Provincial Finance even during the transitional period. We consider this to be the great merit of the reform proposals." The Government of India feel that this is an interpretation which is not consistent with the spirit of the measure. They do not believe that it is intended that the official Government is to be left responsible for a very considerable share, and a very important share, of the administration of the province if the power of the purse is to be very largely in other hands.

Finally, it has been urged that the joint purse might very well be accepted as a sign of confidence, and that we might trust that association will increase the harmony of working. What we wish to suggest is that there is much more chance of confidence growing when each side has seen that the other side is honestly doing its best with its own revenues. We would rather start with a clear-cut definition of the position, a clear field of resources, and a clear responsibility for the best use of them, and trust that the growth of confidence and harmonious feeling would in time bring us nearer the scheme of the Report. That is, as briefly as I can put it, the case for the separate purse.

Reverting to clause 9, in one of their despatches the Government of India took what may be regarded as a somewhat extreme attitude in regard to the procedure in the Legislature dealing with the Budget. I think I may say that that attitude would be to some extent modified by the form in which the Bill now stands, more particularly inasmuch as it is now perfectly clear that the action of the Legislature in handling the Budget is restricted to reducing estimates of expenditure and not to increasing grants, following the Parliamentary procedure. Still, there is this difference of opinion, that the Government of India would press for a legislative handling of the provincial estimates on reserved subjects which would not tie the hands of the Executive. They feel that as at present arranged the power to cut down estimates for a reserved department does amount to a very material control over the administration of the department. We are the last to resent any form of advice or influence that would be exercised over the official half of the Government in dealing with reserved subjects, but we feel that the command over their own estimates—the power to pass their own estimates—is an essential condition of administrative responsibility on their part. It has been proposed, but we do not suggest it, that the estimates for reserved subjects should be taken in grand committee. That, of course, is one conceivable alternative, but we do press the view that resolutions on the Budget passed by the Legislative Council with regard to reserved estimates should not be binding on the Executive. It is perfectly true that the Bill provides machinery by which the Governor, if he is satisfied that reduction is unreasonable, or is likely to interfere with his responsibility for carrying on the proper administration of the reserved subjects, has power to restore the estimate; but every act of this sort will expose the Governor to very serious criticism in the Council, to attack in the Council, and to criticism in the Press, and it is quite conceivable that a Governor may shrink from carrying out this duty even when he feels that he ought to undertake it. It is placing a very heavy task upon an officer who is already very heavily burdened by the duties of this new regime. If I may speak quite frankly, there is a rooted belief among certain sections of Indian politicians that all these exceptional powers of the Governor, the power to restore curtailed estimates, and the power to certify legislation for a Grand Committee, will in effect be very rarely exercised; that the pressure of popular opinion, the effect of agitation, will be so strong that the Governor will regard them rather as a last resort than as an ordinary piece of machinery in the administrative business of the day. The Government or India had proposed that the resolutions of the Legislative Council in regard to transferred estimates should also not be binding on the Ministers, but that, as I say, was before the Bill had assumed its present form, and I think I may say that their opposition to the powers of the Council over transferred estimates would be modified if they had the measure before them in the form it now takes. What we did particularly want was to protect Ministers against grants being enlarged by the Councils, against their policy being upset by a complete alteration of the whole scheme of their Budget; but, inasmuch as the Councils are now restricted to the reduction of estimates I think the Government of India's opposition would be modified if not withdrawn.

In regard to Sub-Clause (3) of Clause 9 the Government of India have sent home a dispatch in which they discuss the constitution of Grand Committees, and endeavour to procure for each province a Grand Committee, which leaves the official half of the Government in no worse position for securing essential legislation than the Provincial Government is at present vis à vis the Morley-Minto Councils. But I fancy that is probably more a matter for rules than for insertion in the Bill. Similarly, in Clause 15, the Government of India wish to represent very strongly a particular form of election for the Council of State. They differ in this respect from the proposals of the Committee presided over by Lord Southborough, and they wish that the two chambers of the Central Legislature should not be elected by precisely the same college, as Lord Southborough's Committee has proposed. But that also again, I am afraid, is probably outside your immediate question, because it will be presumably settled by statutory rules.

11. Still, it is a very important point?—Would you like me to develop it?

12. Yes?—Speaking quite roughly, Lord Southborough's Committee has advised that the elected members of the Assembly, the Lower House, should be elected by the non-official members of the Provincial Legislatures. And they propose that provisionally—I think they admit that it would be inadvisable to maintain it in permanence, but that at any rate provisionally—the elected members of the Council of State should be provided in exactly the same way. Now the Government of India see no virtue in drawing the representatives of the people on these two chambers from the same source, especially as that source is a very limited and narrow one, and also indirect—it is also a form of indirect election, whereas they have always pressed in favour of direct election wherever possible. They realise the difficulties. They realise that Lord Southborough's Committee were faced by a problem which would have required more time for its consideration than they had at their disposal; but they do plead for at least an opportunity of finding an independent electorate for the Council of State. The Report wants to give the Council of State a senatorial capacity, and we should like to carry out that policy by providing a senatorial electorate. We think it can be done. We believe it can be done with very little expenditure of time, that it need not hinder, in any way, the passing of the Bill, and that by the time these bodies come into existence we could have an electoral roll provided and approved by His Majesty's Government, which would produce for the Council of State fresh elements, elements probably of greater responsibility and more representative of the more substantial interests in the State than the proposals of Lord Southborough's Committee permit.

13. Do I understand that they accept the recommendations of Lord Southborough's Committee as regards the Legislative Council?—They do, with some reluctance, accept them as regards the Legislative Council.

14. Was not there some hint in one of the despatches of the Government of India that it would be possible to find a direct electorate?—Yes; but we felt that would probably take more time than was now available.

able. We focussed our recommendations on the Council of State for the time being.

15. You thought that it could be done, but the time would be too long?—Yes. The next point is on Clause 21. This deals with the constitution of the Executive Council of the Governor-General. The present law requires that three members of the Governor-General's Executive Council should have had service under the Crown in India, and that one member should have special qualifications as a lawyer. We recognise that, with the expansion of the Council, the representation of other interests may have to be provided for, and we accept the reduction in the service members from three to two. But we think it is very important that legal qualifications should be maintained for one member. It is of the very highest importance to us to have a legal colleague of high professional standing, and we would beg for at least the perpetuation of the present provision in that respect. We have also suggested both here and, I omitted to say, in the corresponding provisions for the Provincial Executive Council in Clause 4, that there should be a statutory provision for the inclusion of Indian members, but that has been omitted from the Bill, I understand, on the ground of the inadvisability of any racial distinctions of that sort.

In Clause 23 we have a somewhat uneasy feeling that the powers given to the Secretary of State are powers over which there might be no effective control. The Clause is stated in very general terms, and the same general terms attach to the powers of the Secretary of State in other places. But, speaking quite brutally, the law, if it is passed in this form, would enable the Secretary of State to alter the whole constitution by rule. Of course, I state this simply on behalf of the Government of India as a general point. They have no remedy to propose. They realise that the presentation of those rules to Parliament may act as a sufficient safeguard. At the same time, they think it is not improbable that a very important rule might lie on the tables of both Houses of Parliament for thirty days without coming under prominent notice. The only thing that they did constructively put forward was a suggestion that simultaneously with the laying of those rules before Parliament it might be advisable to allow publication in India.

The only other point I have to mention is a purely technical point in Clause 27. Clause 27—a provision which we very strongly support—is made for the appointment of an Auditor-General, who shall be amenable to no influence in India, so to speak. But there is no corresponding provision for appointing a temporary Auditor-General in the absence, owing to leave or otherwise, of the permanent official. A provision to this effect is made in the substantive law for certain other high officials who are specified in the Act, and it may be a pure oversight that it has not been similarly made here.

Speaking strictly to the Bill, I think these are the only proposals that we wish to put forward for amendment.

Major Ormsby Gore.] I presume you want only cross-examination on the points already raised?

Chairman.] Yes.

Major Ormsby Gore.

16. (To the Witness.) Have you any estimate of the proportion of Provincial revenue that will be required for transferred and reserved subjects respectively? Take your own province—the United Provinces—and assuming that the recommendations of the Feetham Committee are adopted, and that transferred subjects and reserved subjects will be such as are in that Report, what, roughly, is the proportion of expenditure which would be required for the two blocks of subjects—about half and half?—Oh, no. I did make a rough estimate of the different provinces, and it varies from two-thirds reserve and one-third transferred, to four-fifths reserved and one-fifth transferred. That is on the basis of expenditure.

17. Assuming that your proposal for the separate purse is accepted, what control would the Legislative Councils have over the expenditure by the official side of the Government? I did not quite follow that. Assuming the separate purse, would the Legislative Council have anything to do with the reserve subject expenditure?—Well, we accept the proposal that they should deal with it by resolutions, but we ask that the resolutions should not be binding—should be influence and not control.

18. That is to say, they would have before them two Budgets each year; one, their own Budget, over which they have absolute control for transferred subjects, and another Budget, on which they would pass resolutions which would have no binding authority?—Yes.

19. Two quite separate procedures?—In practice the estimates would probably be presented as a whole, but in two parts. The first part would be, as you say, figures about which the Council would not be able to pass any binding resolutions; but over the second part they would have the powers that are proposed in the Bill.

20. In Clause 9 you refer to the new despatch of the Government of India in regard to the Grand Committee system. Has it ever been suggested, either in the Government of India or in India anywhere, that instead of having the Grand Committee system in regard to the provincial subjects and the Provincial Councils, where a Governor found it was necessary to get his essential legislation, that essential legislation for the province should be got by the Government of India, which still retains a right, I gather, to legislate in provincial matters?—Yes, that proposal has been put forward. The Government of India considered it, and I think the main difficulty in their minds was the fact that this would open a door to a very serious conflict between the Government of India and the popular element in the Provincial Councils. It is also subject to the obvious objection that it takes the proposal out of the forum which is most familiar with the subject and brings it before a body which represents only partially the interest affected. And also further, there is the difficulty that if a measure which is obnoxious to the leaders of popular opinion in a province were carried into the Legislature of the Government of India, it would certainly run very little chance of passing the Legislative Assembly. It would have to be the subject of special certification procedure there in order to get the Council of State to pass it, so that you would still have your certification complication, only at a different stage.

21. I take it, therefore, the Government of India's view is that it must be the personal responsibility of the Governor in each case which withdraws a Bill or a measure to a Grand Committee?—In the last resort.

22. It is the personal responsibility of the Governor?—Yes, in the last resort.

23. You said the Government of India were considering the creation of a senatorial franchise. Have they also considered whether, if such a senatorial franchise is created for the Council of State, it would be possible to dispense with some of the special franchises and special seats in the Lower House—in the Legislative Assembly?—They have considered the possibility of transferring the detailed representation of interests from the Lower House to the Higher, but one obvious difficulty is that the size of the elected element in the Upper House—only 28 members—would not permit of a very detailed representation of many conflicting and varying interests. It has, however, been considered.

24. You said that Clause 23 would enable the Secretary of State to alter the whole constitution by rules, and that in the House of Commons papers laid on the table are not often observed. Have the Government of India proposed to make any definite recommendations with regard to particular categories of rules being added to this Bill and made statutory?—They have put forward a few—what they call fundamental rules of procedure—for which they would like cover under the Bill, and about which they are a little doubtful whether cover now exists; but I do not think they have gone beyond that.

25. In fact, on the whole they are content to leave it to rules, and they think the rule method is better than increasing the size of the Statute?—Very much more elastic, yes.

Mr. Bennett.

26. Are there not points in which rigidity would be preferred to elasticity? You speak of the elasticity which which rules give. Are there not fundamental points which it would be better to embody in the Act?—There are a few points which we should be glad to see made permanent, so to speak, and not liable to frequent variation.

27. Could you indicate those at the moment?—I doubt whether I could give you a satisfactory catalogue, but I might mention one or two incidentally by way of illustration. We feel, for instance, that it ought to be made perfectly clear that when the Governor consults the two halves of his Government the result should not be decided by a majority vote of, so to speak, the Provincial Cabinet. Our idea is that a consultation between the two halves of the Government will be mainly directed to helping the half which is seised of the immediate issue to arrive at a wise conclusion, with a knowledge of the feelings of the other half on the subject. That is probably as good an illustration as I could give you.

28. Are there any others which occur to you?—One question which has exercised us is the right of provinces to raise loans on the credit of provincial revenues. At the present moment the law makes the Secretary of State responsible for all loans, and hypothecates them on the whole of the revenues of India. We should like to see (and we really are indifferent whether it is provided under the Act or rules or subsidiary legislation) a provision which enables a province to raise a loan on the security of its own revenues.

29. Have you thought what effect that would have upon the credit of the province? Is the credit of the province as good as the credit of the Imperial Government?—I do not suppose it will be.

30. In one of the despatches the Government of India speaks of the desirability of making their second Chamber a Council of, I think, Elder Statesmen?—It is in the Report.

31. By what means would you suggest giving that constitution?—The machinery would be two-fold. In the first place qualifications might be laid down for membership of the Council of State, and in the second place, as I have just been trying to explain, we should like to have a senatorial franchise in addition.

32. Would you briefly indicate the changes which you have observed in what I may call the body politic in India in your time I mean as regards political energies and political activities, and the organisation of political thought. I mean the changes which have occurred in the state of mind of the Indian people generally with regard to political matters?—I first went to India in the year in which the National Congress was born—in 1885. Though it is difficult for one living in the wood to see how the trees have grown, I do feel that there has been an enormous development of the political sense in India since that time. I believe it is very largely due to the growth of this Congress and its activities, and the organisations which have grown out of it. Below it all, of course, lies the spread of Western education and Western ideas. But the India of to-day is almost unrecognisable to people who knew it thirty years ago, and it is very very different from what it was ten years ago. It is an enormously broad subject to cover, but, if I may say so, what strikes me most is the rapidity with which political ideas are penetrating the people. We talk about agitation, and we talk about excesses in the Press and on the platform, but putting all these aside the fact remains that you have reaching into strata of society, which even ten years ago you would have believed could not be affected, an interest in the development of politics and the desire for a larger share of administration of their own affairs. But even deeper than that is the extraordinary spontaneous growth—I think I am right in calling it spontaneous—of the real spirit of notionalism. It is a very real and very vivid influence in the life of India to-day. It is no use our arguing as to its genesis or even its manifestations, for there it is. There is a pride in India, a pride in its achievements, a belief in its future, which inevitably leads to a very rapid development of political consciousness. It is sometimes a little pathetic in its vagueness and its ignorance, but it is there, and it is growing with an enormous rapidity. It is very difficult for me to attempt to survey the situation briefly.

33. Have you noticed this, that classes which twenty years ago, or perhaps ten years ago, were quite apathetic in regard to political matters and public matters generally, are now taking an active and an intelligent interest in Government and politics. Take the trading classes. Twenty years ago was it your experience that they were indifferent in the matter of politics?—Very largely.

34. And that they have now become keenly interested in political movements and are active supporters of political movements?—Generally speaking I think that is true.

35. Would you say that the most perfect administrative mechanism that we could give to India would fail to meet the requirements of the situation, having in view the political activities and the political aspirations which have been aroused in India?—I fully agree—I mean the Government of India fully agree.

Sir J. D. Rees.

36. May I ask is it roughly correct to say that the case of the Government of India is that its wishes have been more or less met except as regards this question of the separate purse and greater representation to the lower castes, both which points are under consideration?—Perhaps I might add the constitution of the Grand Committee. If that is under consideration, if you would add that to your catalogue, I think that is true.

37. That would be about right. Then, as regards the separate purse question, do you hold, like your predecessor Sir James Westland, that the whole revenues of India belong to the Government of India, every rupee, and that everything that is done by the Provincial Governments is merely done as the agents of the Government of India?—Oh no; that theory has gone.

38. Is it correct or not? To whom do the revenues of India belong?—By law to the Secretary of State.

39. Then the Government of India is his agent. It seems to me, then, it has not gone. Were not the arrangements made for provincial assignments with the Provincial Governments, factors in a course of devolution—of decentralisation, rather? Were not these arrangements made admittedly to give the Provincial Governments greater power, greater influence and more independence, in their own areas?—Unquestionably. The original provincial settlement was an arrangement by which the Government of India gave to a province whatever it could spare after meeting its own requirements.

40. And that made the Provincial Government, I presume, more independent, more separate from the Government of India?—No. My point is this: that the provincial settlements were merely a handing out of the crumbs that were left over from the feast of the Central Government, and that every five years any balances which the provinces had acquired were confiscated by the Central Government. The present settlement procedure has broken entirely away from that, and gives the provinces what it is believed they will require normally for their administrative expenditure.

41. That is a process of decentralisation, and, as far as it goes, of greater independence and separation for the Provincial Governments?—Yes, I entirely agree.

42. If that is so would not the provision of a separate purse for the popular half of the Government in like manner make it more separated from, and more independent of, the executive half of the Government?—Precisely.

43. You said that there would be a great pressure of public opinion, as there obviously will be, upon the Governors, which would prevent them from exercising their powers of certification and of veto, or whatever you like to call it. Would not the provision of a separate purse to the popular half of the Government render it far more difficult for the Governor to defer to public opinion in the manner which I gather you yourself approve?—The provision of a separate purse would dispense with the necessity of the Governor having to restore, in the face of a hostile Council, a Budget provision on reserved subjects to which his Council had taken exception.

44. But would not the provision of a separate purse tend to separate the popular half from the official half of the Government? I notice in your evidence you speak of the popular half as the new Popular Government. I ask you this because I take the spirit of the proceedings of the new reform proposals to be to preserve the unity of the Provincial Governments and only to alter the method of administering the transferred subjects. In a word, is it not the case that the provision of a separate purse must operate against the maintenance of the unity of the Provincial Governments? That is what I want to lead up to?—I think that the separate purse will operate against the enforced association of the two halves of the Government. It will give each half of the Government a clearer field of responsibility and work; but I hope that it will not prevent the spontaneous association of the two halves of the Government in advice and consultation.

45. But you do agree that it will so far be a dividing influence that it will make for separation and not for unity?—We say that it makes for a healthy separation in that particular point.

46. It makes for separation, but a healthy separation?—In that particular respect, yes.

47. For a separation which you deem to be healthy?—Yes.

48. The Madras share is to be maintained at a wholly disproportionate amount to the total amount to be made up by the Provincial Governments. What has Madras to compensate them for what the Government of India proposes to make over to them?—As to provincial contributions?

49. Yes?—We do feel that the Madras Government has a very real grievance, and that another Provincial Government is in the same position—the United Provinces—but what we suggested was that although for the moment the partition proposed in the Report must be accepted faute de mieux, we should like to see a Committee of financial relations established as soon as possible to devise an equitable scale of contributions and to propose the stages by which it should be reached.

50. And meawhile Madras and United Provinces will remain the milch cows?—Anyhow they will have sufficient money for their normal expenditure.

51. Upon the main principle that you have stated as regards the revenues of India, is it the case that the Government of India practically is the Government of all India, including the provinces? Have not they a concurrent and an overriding administrative and legislative authority with the Provincial Governments?—They have that position in the administrative sphere, and I think that is also correct of the legislative; but I do not speak with the same confidence in that matter.

52. You do not dispute that as a proposition, if I put it as such, instead of as a question?—No.

53. Is it the case that a Provincial Government at the present time has really extremely little authority except as the agent of the Government of India? Can they make the smallest appoinment, for instance, without permission? Are they not under the thumb of the local officer, an officer of the Government of India known as the Accountant-General?—They have very wide delegated powers in financial matters, which are set forth in a large volume called The Book of Financial Powers.

54. But that volume is entirely at the mercy of the Government of India; it is composed of their orders, is it not?—No, they are the orders of the Secretary of State.

55. Who recommends the Secretary of State in this behalf? On whose recommendation?—The Government of India.

56. If that is so, if the Government of India really is the Government of all India to a great extent, which I gather you admit, is it not the case that India is already a classic case of duality; is not there duality from top to bottom, vertical duality right through?—Unquestionably.

57. Is the objection to duality, which is one of the chief objections raised to this scheme, an objection to duality as a principle or to duality in nationality? Is it an objection to the new half being Indian, or is it an objection to the principle of duality?—I fancy that the motive is different in the case of different objectors.

58. Which do you think is the chief motive—the the Secretary of State and the Secretary of State in critics, the more powerful motive is distrust of a new and untried form of administrative machinery.

59. You do not think that it is distrust of the new agency suggested, namely, Indian instead of European agency?—I trust not.

60. But what do you think?—I have no doubt that that may be in some minds.

61. This is a matter of primary importance. You referred also to the reports of Lord Southborough and the question of the representation and extent to which the Government of India approved of it, and the extent to which they wanted it altered. That brings in the caste question. I should like to ask you as a man who has spent a long life in India this: Has it been your experience that the upper castes ill-treat the lower castes, or do the lower castes as a general thing hold that they are ill-treated by the upper castes? Is there really up till now an upper caste versus lower caste question in the Hindoo body politic in India?—Oh, yes; I think the question is a very real one, but it is much more acute in the south of India than it is in the north.

62. Do you know the south of India, personally?—No; I am afraid not.

63. Then I will ask you about the north. Is there really such a question in the north? Can you really say that the lower castes are actuated by a feeling of jealousy, dislike, or resentment against the upper castes?—I think they accept it as part of the scheme of life.

64. So do I, but that is what I wanted to get. That being so, do not you think that giving particular seats—fifty per cent. of them is recommended in the Government of India letter—to castes qua castes, is to create so far a question which does not now exist, which you yourself state does not exist so far as you know it?—Has that reference to the Madras proposals?

65. Well, it has, but I put it for the moment as a question apart from the Madras aspect of it, with which you are not personally familiar?—I am not quite clear whether you are going beyond the principle of communal representation?

66. No; I am on it—to give a communal representation is the point. The communal question and the caste question are practically one. Will it not create an upper and a lower caste question which, according to what you have just told me, does not now exist in your experience in India?——

Chairman.] I do not think Sir James said that. He carefully said he believed it did exist in Southern India. You must frame your questions so as not to put into his mouth your own opinions.

Sir J. D. Rees.

67. But with respect, I said I would stick to the north because of your personal unacquaintance with the south. I am sorry if I did not make it clear?—In the north of India I do not think we propose giving 50 per cent. of the seats to castes. The recommendations are communal rather than with reference to individual castes within the Hindoo community.

68. At any rate, am I right in supposing—the Chairman having intervened I had better make it quite clear—that in your own experience in India you cannot say that there is really a question between the upper and the lower castes, which is an actual living subject of contention?—I do not think there is any vital hostility in my experience,

69. You made some remarks on Clause 23 of the Draft Bill. It says: "The Secretary of State in Council may, notwithstanding anything in the principal Act, exercise powers of superintendence, direction and control vested in the Secretary of State the Secretary of State in Council and the Gover nor-General in Council." Why not the Governor-General and the Governor-General in Council? He has no functions of superintendence, directon and control peculiar to himself with which this section should deal?—He has certain special personal powers, but I think they are very limited.

70. No doubt, but amongst them is the power of over-riding his Council and sending a minute home to the Secretary of State. They are very large powers, though limited in number. Why is not he brought in that respect under this Clause 23, which deals with the Secretary of State and the Secretary of State in Council,

Council, but does not deal with the Governor-General, but only with the Governor-General in Council?—The reason why I did not refer to this point is that the Government of India would have asked for consideration of the question whether the reference to the Governor-General in Council should not be eliminated from this Clause, treated separately, if necessary. They are inclined to think that the Clause originally intended to permit the Secretary of State to exercise devolution of his own authority, and that the devolution of the authorities in India could be separately dealt with, but the matter is one which we are discussing with the draftsman at the moment.

71. Then it is under consideration?—Yes, it is under consideration.

72. As regards Clause 27 and the appointment of an Auditor-General, will the position of the Accountants-General be unaffected by that measure, and what will the Auditor-General be in respect of the existing Controller-General?—The Auditor-General will take over the whole of the audit and accounting functions of the present Controller-General. He will have no concern with his currency and purely financial functions.

73. Will the Accountants-General, who really control the Provincial Governments in their expenditure, in future be subordinates of the Auditor-General instead of subordinates of the Controller-General, or what is the change effected?—We have in draft a Bill which it is proposed, with the Secretary of State's approval, to place before the Indian Legislative Council at the earliest possible moment, and the purport of which is to make the Accountants-General the deputies of the Auditor-General for the purposes specified in this Bill. They will for the present have to continue to carry out the cash remittances, currency, and various other technical functions which they now direct but we hope in time there will be a severance between the Audit Department and, so to speak, the Exchequer Department. That can be arranged, we believe, by legislation in India.

74. Arising out of what Mr. Bennett asked you, do you think, quite apart from the question of personal predilections or personal feelings, or anything else, that the continuance of the bureaucratic regime in India is no longer possible and compatible with carrying on the Government without continual discontent and trouble?—I think that steadily increasing modifications are absolutely necessary.

Mr. Bennett.

75. I was wondering whether we ought not to avoid speaking of the future Government of India as one half Indian and the other half English, seeing that even in the Executive Councils, Provincial Councils, there will be at least one, and possibly two, Indian members; I think it is as well that at the beginning we should avoid loose expressions of that kind—is not that so?—that they cannot strictly be described as one half Indian and one half English?—I have attempted to use, for want of better parlance, the words official and popular. They are not perfect.

Chairman.] The Committee have now some business to do in private, and therefore we will ask you to come back at 11 o'clock on Monday.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE EARL OF SELBORNE IN THE CHAIR.

Sir JAMES MESTON, K.C.S.I., is recalled; and further Examined, as follows:—

Lord Islington.

76. In your evidence last week you explained at length the reasons which led the Government of India to propose a financial system in the Provinces different from that which had previously been agreed upon and which is outlined in Clause 9 of the Bill?—Yes.

77. You propose now a separate purse instead of a joint purse, and in your evidence the other day you elaborated your reasons for the preference that you hold for this method?—Yes.

78. In the first place, I would like to elicit this: Am I right in saying that originally and for some considerable time, the Government of India strongly advocated a system of divided heads as the basis of relationship between Imperial and Provincial Finance?—They did.

79. And their main reason for advancing that principle was, I understand, that in a quasi-federal system it is better to have completely different sources of revenue for the Central Government and the Provincial Governments?—Yes.

80. It was found, however, on closer investigation, that the heads of taxation which would be allocated for purely Imperial purposes would be found to be insufficient for the purpose?—For the central requirements, yes.

81. And as a result of that a scheme was devised, was it not, a somewhat complicated scheme of divided heads?—Are you talking about past history?

82. Yes, for the moment I am talking of the past history of the financial arrangement as advocated by the Government of India for Imperial purposes?—As advocated in the Report?

83. As advocated by the Government of India; not as advocated in the Report?—I am very anxious not to appear at cross purposes. I am afraid I was thinking of the old system of provincial settlements in my previous answers to you. Do you wish me to describe the movement of the Government of India's mind in regard to the proposals in the Report?

84. I merely wish to elicit from you the change of mind of the Central Government in regard to Imperial financial arrangements? — Then I think I can put it briefly. When the inquiry conducted by the Secretary of State and the Viceroy was at work in India, a scheme was put forward by the then Finance Member of the Government of India, advocating what is practically a development of the existing provincial settlement system. One of the objections taken to this was the retention of the old method of divided heads, which was regarded as likely to provoke interference and perpetuate petuate the existing sense of grievance, and the Government of India thereupon placed before the Secretary of State and the Viceroy virtually the system which is accepted in that Report.

85. You have now in its place the scheme of lump contributions from the Provinces?—The essential feature of the proposal in the Report is that to which you have already referred, the clear separation as between the Central and the Provincial heads of the main sources of revenue. The result, as you also mentioned, is that with any logical division of that sort the Central Government is left with insufficient resources for its central needs, and it consequently has to levy subscriptions from the Provinces.

86. In the light of that more intimate experience that you attained by further investigation, would you be prepared to say that you prefer a system as now proposed to that of the original system suggested, of divided heads?—Subject to the ultimate equalisation of burdens among the Provinces, it is certainly preferable to my mind.

87. Now, as regards the Provincial proposals of finance, do you regard your proposed dualised system as a sounder system than the joint purse system, originally proposed, or do you propose it because you regard it as an indispensible and almost inevitable corollary to the proposal of a dualised system of government?—As a financial device, the Government of India considered it superior, and as a political measure they consider that it essentially follows from the dual Executive.

88. As a financial system, the Government of India regards this divided proposal as preferable?—As decidedly preferable; yes.

89. Do you think that a dualised system of government could properly be worked with the original scheme, or would you say that it would be difficult to work it unless you have a dualised financial system?—Put in the briefest possible manner, it seemed to the Government of India that a dualised system, involving as it does the responsibility of two separate Governments in the same area, inevitably necessitates the control by each of these Governments over their own finances, and they would find it extremely difficult to picture a dualised system working with a unitary purse.

90. Now under your proposal of the separate purse can you tell us how you propose to raise the contributions to the Imperial Fund, the Central Government? Is it to be collected from both the reserved and the transferred Budgets?—No, it would be a first charge upon the reserved Budget.

91. It is to be a first charge upon the reserved Budget, and the transferred Budget is to be exempted from any obligation to the Central Government?—Yes.

92. Does that strike you in any way as isolating those who are coming into the constitutional system from central requirements for which they are as much concerned as anybody else?—It is purely a matter of convenience. It would be just as easy to make the contribution a first charge upon the transferred Budget. The whole matter is disposed of when you make your settlement as between the two. The assumption on which we proceeded, and I admit the contrary assumption might just as easily have been accepted, was that in estimating the requirements of the reserved departments we should include the contribution to the Government of India.

93. But assuming this financial system came into practice over a period of years, would not you apprehend that the transferred branch would find themselves completely isolated from one of the most important obligations of India, and get further and further removed from it, if they did not pay their due contribution towards the common purse?—The isolation is only relative. When the arrangement is made as between the two parts of the Government the share of revenue which is allotted to the transferred subjects is and has to be arrived at with reference to the whole liabilities of the province. Among those liabilities are not only the contributions to the Government of India, but the service of loans which may have been raised by the province in the past or of loans which may be raised in the future. Among them may conceivably be permanent charges such as you have in England against the Consolidated Fund, charges of the pay of Judges. It has been suggested that the pay of the Governor and of all-India Services are also to be treated in the same manner. So that your settlement as between the two halves has to have regard to the whole liabilities of the province, and not only to the immediate requirements of each half. To that extent there is not the sharp isolation, I think, which you apprehend.

94. Now as regards the separate purse in its internal working within the province, I understand that your principle is to allocate a certain head of taxation to become available exclusively for the maintenance of certain specified services. Is that a correct interpretation?—I should put it a little differently, I think. The intention is that each half of the Government should enjoy the proceeds of the revenues of the departments which it administers. There is no ear-marking of specific heads of revenue for specific purposes beyond that.

95. But that would be ear-marking, would it not, in a pretty precise form?—It is not ear-marking in the sense that a particular tax is ear-marked for a particular expenditure purpose. It is ear-marking in the sense that whatever revenue is derived from the departments controlled by half the Government concerned is at the disposal of that section of the Government.

96. Now may I ask what may occur as possible and probable contingencies? Take first that the revenue would be found to be in excess of the reasonable requirements of the services. If that be the case the suggestion is that the surplus may be handed over to a reserved service, if the reserved service requires it. The revenue which is in the hands of the minister for a specific service is found to be in excess of what may be deemed the reasonable requirements of that service?—Yes, I understand.

97. You see my point?—Yes.

98. In the first place I put this question: Would not that entail an inducement that might be almost irresistible to a Minister and to the Legislative Council to project unnecessary schemes and spend more than is really required for that service?—The intention of the scheme is that Ministers should have the whole of their own revenues available for the whole of their own expenditure. If those revenues are not sufficient for that expenditure they have to receive a subsidy from the other half of the Government. This, I take it, is your proposal? If the revenues are more than sufficient for their expenditure they will have a large surplus. Now there are two contingencies to be dealt with. In the first place this may mean that the revenues available to the official half of the Government are insufficient for their expenditure, in which case the settlement would involve an adjustment by which part, at least, of the surplus of the popular half would be allotted for a period of years to the official half. That is one contingency. The other contingency is that after that settlement has been made the surplus revenue of the popular half is still excessive; that would only mean that their balances are increased. It might, as you suggest, afford a temptation to heavy expenditure; but the expenditure would naturally be scrutinised with the same care as any other projects.

99. The power of expenditure under your scheme rests to a very great extent in the hands of an individual Minister in association, it is true, with the Governor?—Very much in his own department, yes.

100. When that first alternative takes place, as undoubtedly it will in the ordinary practice if this comes into force, do you apprehend there will be a certain amount of friction and wrangling on the part of the contending parties—the Minister, as representing the Legislative Council, being very reluctant, and showing reluctance, to give up a portion of the surplus for the reserved service?—That is the strongest possible argument, to our minds, against the joint purse, that that friction—the friction which you describe—will be continuous. Under the proposals for the separate purse that reluctance to give up a share of the revenue will certainly be manifested, but it will be settled for a period of years at the settlement.

101. But do you really see any hope of abatement of that friction under this very precise form which you indicate?—Under the separate purse system?

102. Yes?—Our point is that friction will occur, and undoubtedly must occur, when two sides are struggling for resources out of a common reservoir at the time of settlement, and it will probably be protracted for some little time afterwards, but it is by no means so great or in its cumulative effect so serious as the annual friction which would occur over the distribution of each Budget season under the joint purse system.

103. I put this question without any suggestion of undue disparagement. I fully realise the difficulties of evolving a scheme, but as it stands now would not you be prepared to say that it does suggest a very serious reversal of recognised orthodox finance as practised in every other part of the Empire?—The separate purse is unorthodox?

104. Yes, both in principle and in working out its practice, does it not rather shock your long-skilled economic conscience on its merits?—It is in the closest possible analogy with the arrangements between the Central Government and the provinces. It is extremely familiar in India.

105. It is familiar under the old bureaucratic scheme, but I am dealing now with the commencement of a new constitutional scheme?—The inevitable and ultimate defence is that each side of the Government gets control of its own purse.

106. To avoid wrangles you suggest a fixed adjustment between the halves of the Government over a period of years?—Yes.

107. Will not this have a tendency to stereotype the position of a department over a period of years?—That is exactly what we are trying to secure.

108. I know. You say that this method will create a tremendous stimulus to development?—Yes!

109. But is not there a possible other side of the picture, that it might have a contrary effect?—The stimulus would develop all our resources—that was my argument—not the development of expenditure. Our argument as regards expenditure was that it provided an assurance for a prolonged period of time of the resources that would be available for the department, and would therefore allow the department to lay out its financial policy with a confidence which is impossible under the joint-purse arrangement.

110. The stimulus for the development of resources, apart from very careful collection, seeing you get your full value, means the power for further taxation, does it not, within that area?—Yes, it connotes that, certainly.

111. Of course, in all these things one is only speaking rather hypothetically, but you would admit, I suppose, that whilst on consideration you throw the weight of your view in the direction you have indicated, it is arguable that it might also be anticipated that it would create a potential stimulus for conflict and meddling, which is the very result you want to avoid?—As I said the other day we did hope that the separate purse would prevent meddlesomeness, which, I may say, is an entirely different matter from legitimate consultation and advice.

112. Now, you take Excise, and you suggest that by making it a source of transferred revenue it might crush the enthusiasm of those who desire to break down the facilities for intoxicants. You said that in your evidence?—It will steady them. I think, in their policy.

113. It will steady them?—Yes.

114. Looked at from the broader point of view, would you admit that this is rather a localised, if not primitive, method of educating India to a high form and to a high sense of financial responsibility?—It is a direct method; it is a method of which the consequences are immediately apparent; consequently, we think it is an instructive method.

115. A policy of dealing with excise is a question rather of high policy, and would in ordinary cases be considered and decided on by the corporate mind of the Cabinet?—In England, I suppose it would.

116. In your case you are leaving it to the decision, and a decision influenced by outside facts, of a Minister?—It seems to us essentially a class of case which ought to be left to the decision of a Minister. It is one of the many forms of social reform which Indian opinion considers that we have neglected in the past, and it seems to us extremely desirable that precisely this form of question should be one of the first responsibilities in which a Minister engages himself.

117. And should have the deciding voice by himself?—Should undoubtedly have the deciding voice, yes.

118. I think another point you raised is that in cases where an expenditure is over a period of years before the undertakings are completed there will be great advantage by the dual system of finance. You say that it is easier to estimate—that the Finance Department would find it easier to finance over a period of years in individual cases than in the whole, but surely the Finance Department business, in order to get at the whole resources and the estimated whole resources for years to come, can only be found by carefully investigating and estimating each individual source?—Quite so. The Finance Department, as I conceive it, if the separate purse system is established, will know for three, five, or seven years ahead what are going to be the resources at the disposal of each half of the Government. It will have a very clear indication from its previous experience of the rate of progress of those resources. At the present moment, for instance, we know roughly the percentage by which provincial finances expand. In the same way there will be established, through experience, a rate of expansion for the two different purses. And the section of the Finance Department which is to deal with each purse will then be in a position to commit itself to projects of expenditure against each with a reasonably sure knowledge that when the time comes to mature those projects the funds will be available. Our point is that under the joint system that confidence will not be present. The Finance Department will not know beyond the year in which it is actually working what amount of revenues are going to be at the disposal of the Governor in Council and of Ministers respectively, and, consequently, it will not be in a position to advise either the Governor in Council or Ministers as to the acceptance of projects of continuous and expanding expenditure.

119. So that after careful consideration you consider that you arrive at a more accurate estimate by dealing with it in this divided fashion than would be arrived at by estimating each and then aggregating the whole resources of the province?—I do not think I should quite put it in that way. What I would say is that in this way we should have an opportunity of knowing the picture of our resources for each half of the Government separately.

120. The detailed picture?—The detail of the two halves. Under the other system the two halves are absolutely kaleidoscopic; you cannot say from year to year what are going to be the resources at their disposal. It is only a matter for negotiating and bargaining at the beginning of each financial year. That is what I say handicaps the Finance Department in its advice as to projects of the class which you have in mind.

121. But that kaleidoscopic aspect—is not that a very strong argument for having a comprehensive whole if you are to arrive at a sound estimate of the resources of the province?—We shall have an estimate of the expansion of the resources of the Government as a whole, but that is no use when we do not know what share is going to be at the disposal of each half of the Government.

122. You give a fifth reason for your case, on account of the remarks of certain prominent Indians?—Yes; I quote them as an example.

123. As over-interpreting what is really meant?—Yes.

124. You really think this proposal of divided heads is going to have a tendency towards abating those very efforts which you apprehend?—The efforts of control over the dual purse?

125. As suggested by those Indians, that the Ministerial branch of the Government would have control not only over their own affairs, but over the affairs of reserved subjects as well?—I think it must undoubtedly have that effect.

126. Now, you suggest that either half of the Government should have the power to raise taxation?—Yes.

127. In

127. In other words that means that an individual Minister may have the power to propose to the Legislative Council the acceptance of a tax within the perview of his own Department?—The procedure which we have proposed, which is elaborated in one of our dispatches, is that if an individual Minister wishes for fresh taxation he places his proposal before the Governor, who thereupon convokes a meeting of his Councillors and his Ministers to discuss the proposal from every possible point of view. There is, broadly speaking, no tax which does not affect more than the Department immediately concerned with its collection. The effects of taxation spread very widely, and consequently it is of the highest importance that the Governor should have before him the proposal in its executive aspects, its economic and financial aspects, and possibly its general political aspects. It is quite conceivable you may have a tax which causes unrest or affects the general happiness of the people. We consider it of the first importance that the whole of the united wisdom of the Government should be turned on to any proposal of that sort; but we virtually leave it to the Governor to say, after he has heard everything that can be said from all sides of the question, whether the tax is one which he is prepared to endorse or not. If he endorses it, the Minister would then proceed to place it before the Legislative Council, and probably in the form of a Bill, and we assume he would have the support in so doing of his colleagues on both sides of the Government. The further point which your question suggests is that taxation raised by one-half of the Government should be taken only out of the field which that one-half administers. We do not go so far as that. We thought it quite conceivable, for example, that Ministers may wish, for the purposes of expanding primary education, to assess upon land. Now, the Land Revenue, according to the proposals which at present hold the field, is a reserve subject, but we should not think for a moment of debarring a Minister from proposing, after the procedure which I have indicated, a tax upon land as a measure for financing education. So that the barriers between the reserved and transferred departments would not necessarily be barriers for taxation purposes.

128. As regards taxation, if I have interpreted what you say correctly, although the Minister may propose, the decision is made by a Unitary Government?—No.

129. Plus the Governor?—It is not made in any sense by a majority of the Government; it is made by the decision of the Governor to support his Minister, after hearing what all his colleagues have to say. The proposal would emanate from, be on the responsibility of, and be carried through by, the Minister, but would have the Governor behind it.

130. And it would undergo full discussion in the combined Government?—Yes.

131. And I suppose you would say the same for borrowing?—Yes. There is a supplementary—though a very important—reason for that in so far as all borrowing will be, we conceive, upon the credit of the general revenues of the Province, not upon the revenues of either half of the Government.

132. So that really all full responsibility as to whether this should take place or not, both in regard to taxation or borrowing, rests on the shoulders of the Governor ultimately?—Constitutionally, it rests on the Governor with his Ministers, or on the Governor in Council, as the case may be, but it is the Governor who has to make up his mind whether he is going to support it.

133. He has got to make the decision?—Yes.

134. A Minister puts forward a scheme of taxation; undergoes very careful discussion in the combined Government, and the objections to it exceed the advantages of it; it rests with the Government to decide whether that taxation should be imposed, or whether it should be refused?—It comes virtually to that, yes.

135. It comes entirely to that, does it not?—Constitutionally the position is probably a little different. It might be stated a little differently.

136. Well, I will not press it further. Now there are one or two questions as regards the dual system of government, and it is on account of this that you have based your dual system of finance, is it not?—Yes.

137. You propose to give the Governor in the ultimate resort a veto over the Ministers?—To the extent provided in the Bill, yes.

138. I will put it in this way: A Minister brings up an important Bill in regard to education or agriculture, assuming those are transferred services. He brings them up to the Governor, and it is he and the Governor, those two, who discuss and decide on the original draft of the Bill as brought up from the department?—The first discussion would certainly be with them, yes.

139. Apart from all the difficulties of the situation, on merits would not you say, especially in the early days of India, that the Bill would have very much more chance of being sound and satisfactory if it had the benefit of full discussion and possible decision by the corporate mind of the Cabinet?—The proposal certainly does not contemplate that it should not have full discussion as between the two halves of the Government in a matter such as you describe of grave general importance; the Governor would naturally and inevitably call the two halves of his Government together for consultation before deciding whether to support or to discourage his Minister.

140. But there would be no power of decision in that conference on the part of other than the Minister of the Government?—There would be no voting; no decision by a majority.

141. Your objection to having any voting or any decision in its corporate capacity as a Cabinet is because you consider it would evade the underlying principles of the announcement of the 20th August?—Precisely.

142. Now suppose the Provincial Government consisted of half officials and half non-officials, the latter appointed from the elected members and holding the portfolios of the transferred subjects, the Governor presiding, your contention is that in such a scheme the Ministers are thus bereft of their responsibility to the Legislative Council. Is not that so? That is the contention, is it not, in favour of the dual system of government?—The contention is that individual responsibility is obscured; but what you have described of course is dualism. You have your Ministers responsible for the transferred subjects.

143. You have your Ministers responsible for their department; but they come to the Cabinet?—In so far as they come to the Cabinet and are liable to be overruled or outvoted, we say that responsibility is obscured, that there is no individual responsibility on the part of Ministers.

144. Let me put a point to you: I hope you will not consider it too far away. I suppose you will admit that to comply faithfully with the pronouncement of the 20th August, the constitution certainly in its early days in India need not be more popular in character than the constitution as it exists to-day in England?—No; I accept that.

145. You would accept that?—Yes.

146. Now I will ask you this further question: What difference do you see between the position and power of an official member of the Provincial Council and a member of the British Cabinet who is a member of the House of Lords?—I find it difficult to compare the two, but if there is to be any comparison I should say in the first instance the official member of the Provincial Government is amenable to Parliament.

147. The member of the House of Lords, do you mean, is?—No, the official member of a Provincial Government is appointed by the Secretary of State as the agent of Parliament and is thus amenable to Parliament.

148. To the British Parliament?—Yes.

149. Now I am putting another hypothesis: Assuming that instead of his being appointed for a fixed period so that he is irremovable, assume his appointment and withdrawal rested on the discretion of the Government precisely in the same way as the position of a member of the British Cabinet, whether he be drawn from the House of Commons or the House of Lords, rests on the discretion of the Prime Minister, would not that, pro tanto, advance the popular aspect of the Cabinet?—Your official member would hold office during the pleasure of the Governor?

150. Yes?—I see. I do not see how it would make a Government a more popular Government; it would make the official members of the Government more amenable to the Governor, and to that extent I should think it would make him much more autocratic.

151. Is not that assuming that the Governor is always going to take a course contrary to the desires of the Legislature?—I think if the Governor is a strong man he will necessarily procure as colleagues men who will take his view, and, among other disadvantages of the scheme you propose, I think it would have a most disastrous effect upon the public services. It would immediately lead—it is difficult to put it in correct words—but it would immediately lead to the time server coming to the top, and to the man who is not afraid of giving honest and fearless advice disappearing from the Cabinet that you describe.

152. I suppose that might be said of any Cabinet?—I am not familiar with Cabinets.

153. I will not press that point further. Now I will put another point to you. In regard to this the most difficult problem we have to face, the dual system of government. Has it ever struck you in the scheme which you have evolved that, in your genuine desire, in which we all participate, to comply with the announcement of the 20th August, you are somewhat overdoing the individual power and responsibility of the Minister, and that, if you are not actually forgetting you are at any rate underrating the very effective popular power which you are giving to the Legislative Council? You are giving them a majority of two-thirds elected members, with power to sanction or to refuse transferred subjects. Do you follow that question?—I certainly do not think we underrated the latter consideration. We have always felt very acutely the position of the Minister vis-a-vis of a popular assembly. I find myself in very considerable difficulties in alluding to that. It will, of course, be his duty to try to lead and guide the assembly, and it is precisely for that reason that we attach such enormous importance to the assistance and advice that he receives from the Governor. He will require that at every step in the earlier stages of the new régime. But with reference to the earlier part of your question, I doubt whether it is possible for us to overrate the importance of giving right away from the outset some measure and some form of responsibility to the individual Minister. It seemed to us the only way in which we could train the leaders of the future to the task which lies before them. So long as we had them sheltered in what you have described as a Coalition Cabinet, so long we felt that there was no possibility of their either acquiring the habit of coming to fearless decisions or being held accountable for these decisions.

154. In spite of all that you have said, I suppose you do fully realise that in clothing this individual Minister with the powers which you suggest you are giving him far more extensive and far more arbitrary powers than those possessed by any Minister, however important he may be, in the British Cabinet. You realise that?—Well, I have no personal knowledge of the extent to which the action of the individual Minister in the British Cabinet is liable to be corrected and overruled by what corresponds to our Governor.

155. However important he may be, he cannot suggest to Parliament, with the mere assent of the Prime Minister, taxation; neither can he propose legislation. It has got to go through the whole procedure of the corporate mind of the Cabinet, and, if it is very important legislation, it has probably to go to a Cabinet Committee?——

Chairman.] I think you must be careful, Lord Islington, how you put these questions. You are getting into a very complicated question. Some of us would not agree with your statement.

Lord Islington.] I merely want to argue the point.

Chairman.] But you must not state as facts matters which are in dispute.

Lord Islington.

156. I did not realise that I was stating anything which was in dispute. (To the Witness.) You are suggesting that Bills, whether important or less important, will be dealt with by the Minister and the Governor?—I think I did suggest—if not, I do it now—that in any measure of importance the Governor will naturally invoke the advice of both halves of his Government. The whole theory of joint consultation depends upon the discretion of the Governor, and it is to our mind inconceivable that a Bill such as, for example, for universal compulsory education, should be introduced into the assembly without the whole force of the Government having been turned on for its consideration. But the responsibility for the Bill lies on the Minister when it comes before the Council, and the difference between this procedure and the procedure with which you are drawing analogies, is, to my mind, simply this, that in the one case we are working through a transitional stage to responsible Government, whereas in the other case you have reached responsible Government, and during the period of transition we must have transitional machinery.

157. Does not really the significance and power of popular Government rest in this scheme very largely in the Legislative Council?—Oh, yes.

158. You have proposed a constitution which will secure that decisions on transferred subjects will be secured in the Legislative Council?—Yes.

159. Although I fully appreciate what you say with regard to the transitional stage, I want to elicit from you by the questions which I put that on its merits and in the early days of India especially, it is important that you should have the full mind of all concerned rather than individual minds?—I quite appreciate that point.

160. Your object in this whole scheme is to establish two degrees of power?—Two sections of power

161. Yes, two sections you may term them. There is the section which deals with transferred and the section which deals with reserved?—Yes.

162. In the Executive you accomplish this by giving two different sets of people these powers respectively in the form of two Executives?—Yes.

163. In the Legislative Council, on the other hand, you give to one and the same people the two degrees of power?—Subject always to the power of the Governor to withdraw a Bill which vitally concerns a reserved department from the purview of the assembly.

164. I admit that, but I am speaking quite broadly. The Legislative Council as a body occupies that position in two capacities. It occupies its position as a constitutional body for transferred subjects with those reservations which you have mentioned; it occupies the position as a critical body for reserved services; and therefore one and the same people are discharging the two duties in the Legislative Council?—Yes, I think that is broadly true.

165. Now to be consistent, should not that be carried on to the Executive, and should not it with consistency and practicability be carried out?—In other words, should not we have the Executive deciding certain matters and advising upon others?

166. Yes, that is it. Why should not you have an Executive like this as I have already described, of two official members appointed under the conditions which I have mentioned, two non-official members from the elected members of the Legislative Council, with their porfolios, and a Governor; a Governor with an instrument of instruction from the Secretary of State to throw his influence in the direction in accordance with the announcement of 20th August, of transferred subjects, and another instrument of instruction to the Governor to be given full discretion—I will not put it higher than that—as to the course he should take after full consideration and decision in his Cabinet on reserved subjects; and—I will not put it higher than this—would that, in your judgment, place the Governor in a more invidious position than he would be placed in under that scheme?—I think it places him in a more powerful position, but the only way in which I could answer this very comprehensive question—I do not know whether it is permissible—is to state the objections to the scheme which you have put forward. I do not know whether I am allowed to do that now.

Lord Islington.] It is a most important question. I would suggest that we should get as much information on this point as possible, and especially from the witness, who is here to represent the Government of India.

Chairman.] Yes.

Witness.]

Witness.] The proposal that Lord Islington has outlined has been very forcibly placed before the Government of India, and most anxiously considered by them. It has had various forms, but put in its simplest form it comes to this: that you are going to have something in the nature of a Coalition Government in the provinces, that part of that Government is to be a body of officials holding their authority from the British Parliament ultimately, and that the other part is to be a body of non-officials holding their authority from the Local Legislative Assembly. I think that states the case fairly.

Lord Islington.

167. I do not altogether accept the word "Coalition"?—I hope you will correct me.

168. I do not think "Coalition" is quite the word?—Then I will withdraw it; I will say a composite Government.

169. Yes, that is better?—The form in which the proposal last stood before the Government of India contemplated no definite distribution of portfolios. It left it to the Governor to decide which of his colleagues was going to hold any particular portfolio for the time being, and in many ways that has the advantage of great simplicity. Now that scheme, to our mind, would not stand an analysis for at least three reasons. The first was—I repeat it again, I am afraid you have heard it ad nauseam—that it does not give anything more than a superficial training in real responsibility. Any member of the Government, if his policy happens to be challenged, can always retreat behind the corporate responsibility of the composite Government.

170. That is the case with all other Governments, is it not?—I do not know sufficiently well to answer that. We are endeavouring to get the beginnings of responsibility. We want to get our Ministers imbued with a sense of the duty which rests upon them of coming to a decision and standing by it, both before the electorate and the Council, and of being judged by it and its results by the Parliamentary inquiry which gets to work ten or twelve years hence. As I say, our first objection is that a composite Government does not train individual responsibility in the initiation of policy.

171. Would it be inconvenient if I interrupted you for one moment?—No.

172. You say it would not train the Minister, but have not you rather forgotten the immense amount of work which a Minister has in his own department and the responsibility and the discretion that he has in that department?—No, not at all.

173. Quite apart from what he brings to the decision of the Cabinet?—No, I fully realise it.

174. Would not that be a very great and effective training in responsibility in that kind of work, as it is in the British Government?—It is a training up to a point, but what we say is that when broad questions of policy come up the responsibility is absorbed in the corporate responsibility. But the second, and possibly the greater and certainly the less academic, argument is that this inevitably involves a conflict between the two halves of the composite Government from which there is no escape except by deadlock. You have the two halves of the Government deriving their authority and their ideals and their standard of work and everything from different sources, and those two ideals and standards must from time to time clash; and when they clash which is to prevail? Is it going to be the official Government, with its somewhat autocratic powers, dependent on the good will of the Governor, or is it going to be the popular half of the composite Government, resting on the assured support of the Assembly? We do not know which it is going to be, but that the two will diverge and will conflict we think is inevitable.

175. You will admit that they will diverge in both schemes, but you think there will be less chance of conflict by keeping them in water-tight compartments, but giving them an opportunity of full discussion together?—Undoubtedly, because each half of the Government can pursue and develop its own policy. Here there will be an impasse. The question of policy will be before the composite Government; the decision upon it can only be reached by a political crisis. We are most anxious to avoid this at all costs. We believe that conflict between these two ideals and standards is going to be the greatest danger of the new régime, and we do believe that when a conflict of this sort comes it will be in the power of the Ministers, of the elected members of the composite Government, with the whole power of the Assembly to paralyse the work of the Government. The third objection we have is that there is no line of gradual development emerging from this scheme; the only step which you can take after you have established your composite Government is to give a majority of Ministers, and thus introduce responsible Government straight away. The gradation which the Report contemplates and which we regard as absolutely essential to the training of this full responsible Government is entirely absent from that proposal. These in brief are our objections to the suggestion.

176. What would be the gradation under your scheme? What would be the next advance?—The steady transfer of one department after another until the whole administration passes into the hands of Ministers.

Lord Sinha.

177. I will endeavour to confine myself to the different clauses of the Bill, which you have dealt with. I will deal first of all with Clause 4 of the Bill. I think your suggestion with regard to that came to this, that in the three Presidencies there should be, as there are now, three members of the Executive Council, two official and one non-official?—And in any Province in future to which a Governor may be appointed from outside India, yes.

178. The Government of India recognises, does it not, that except the three Presidencies and the other Provinces, that is five out of the eight, you continue to have members of the Indian Civil Service at the head of the Local Government?—For the present, yes.

179. And that apparently is given effect to in the second Schedule to the Bill dealing with official salaries where the salaries of the Governors are differentiated according as they are the three Presidencies or the other Provinces?—Yes, the Schedule simply repeats the existing arrangements.

180. That practically means that, having regard to the salaries assigned to the Governors of the United Provinces, the Punjab, Bihar and Orissa, the Central Provinces and Assam, you are not likely to get any men from the public life of England to go out as Governors of those five Provinces on those salaries?—That I could not say.

181. That is what you expect; it is on the basis that the present system should remain that those salaries are assigned? The salaries remain the same because the present system is expected to continue. Is not that so?—That is so, yes.

182. The Bill apparently adopts, at least, for the lifetime of this Act, if it is going to be an Act, the recommendation of the Government of India?—I am very glad to hear it.

183. Does it not seem to you so?—Frankly, the Schedule was prepared without any reference to the future. It was directed partly against giving existing incumbents higher salaries than they now draw, and partly against extravagance, and I cannot call to mind that during the discussions in the Government of India it was related in any way to their proposals as regards the staffing of the Provinces.

184. What I wanted to put to you was this, that the salaries assigned do not make it likely or possible to get public men from the public life of England for the Governorship of these Provinces?—I hope you will pardon me for not answering that.

185. Very well; I will not press it further. If I am right in that, that would be contrary to the recommendations of the Joint Report, would it not? It goes against the recommendation of the Joint Report, which was to the effect that ordinarily the Governors would be taken or imported from England—from the public life of England?—What is the reference?

186. I am afraid I have not the reference ready. I gave you my general impression of the Report——

Mr. Montagu.] Is it paragraph 218: "In all Provinces the head of the Government would be known as Governor, though this common designation would not imply any equality of emoluments or status, both of which would continue to be regulated by the existing distinctions, which seem to us generally suitable."

187. No

Lord Sinha.

187. No, I will not trouble you with regard to that if it is not your impression of the Report. I gave you really my impression. If I can I will find it later?—The Government of India, in making the suggestion, were influenced by the fact that, certainly in the more backward provinces, it might be difficult for an administrator unfamiliar with the languages and habits of the people to assume control at present, but that as political life developed and education expanded we regard it as inevitable that that time will arrive.

188. I am not quarrelling with that recommendation. I am leading up to the point about the Councils which is dealt with in Clause 4. The Decentralisation Commission also recommended that, did they not, namely, that the Governors should be imported from the public life of England, though the Civil Service was not to be excluded invariably from holding such appointments?—I think that was the purport. I do not remember the precise words.

189. So far as the Executive Councils are concerned, up to 1911 there are only two, namely, Madras and Bombay?—Yes.

190. And there are only two members?—Yes.

191. Both officials?—Yes.

192. It is only since 1912 that you have had four Councils, namely, Madras, Bombay, and the new ones being Bengal and Bihar and Orissa?—Yes.

193. And there have been three members of the Executive Council in those?—Yes.

194. Presumably when there are Departments transferred to Ministers some of the work that is now being done by the Executive Council will be done by the Ministers?—Yes.

195. Presumably, therefore, there will be less work to do so far as the Executive Council is concerned?—We appreciated that argument, but we felt that, on the other hand, it would probably be impossible for the Governor to undertake definite portfolios under the new régime. He will have a very great deal of work which does not fall upon him now in reconciling the two halves of the Government and helping his Ministers and watching the political development generally. We felt he would almost have to be counted out as the holder of a portfolio whereas at present the Governor in Presidency Governments very often takes a considerable share in the executive work.

196. That might be remedied by having two non-official members of the Executive Council?—Quite.

197. The whole idea of the Report as well as of the White Paper issued with the Bill is that there should be an equal number of officials and non-officials in the Executive Council?—Yes.

198. And the voting power should be the same?—Yes.

199. And the paragraph in the Report which is relied upon by the Government of India for the purpose of having one more official member is really directed against what was asked for by a certain section of Indian political opinion, namely, that the Indian Civil Service should be excluded altogether from the Executive Council?—Yes, I accept that.

200. And so far as you know any departure from the idea of equal voting power in the Executive Council will be very unacceptable to Indian political opinion?—Yes, I agree.

201. And the fact of there being one Indian member in a sort of permanent minority will greatly affect the position of the Indian member of the Executive Council; he will always feel that he is in a permanent minority?—Quâ Indian?

202. Quâ non-official?—Yes, he probably will.

203. And it would be considered a whittling down of this scheme of the Report, would it not?—I believe it is being so described, yes.

204. Now going on to Clause 6, I understood your suggestion to be that though the numbers given in column 1 of the 1st Schedule—that is, the aggregate number of the members of the Council might be retained—the details in the other columns should be omitted?—Yes.

205. Do not you think that there would be enough elasticity by the Clause which I have given—Clause 6a?—In the proviso?

206. Yes?—The Government of India have suggested in a telegram, which arrived recently that 5 per cent. is not adequate, and that 10 per cent. would be preferable; but my instructions had reference not so much to the elasticity as to the uncertainty of the communal electorates at the moment. We were very anxious that the proposals put forward by Lord Southborough's Committee should be subjected to public criticism. We believe that they might be amended, and consequently that the ratio as between the three columns of election might be found to call for variation.

207. You have noticed that not only is there the 5 per cent. margin provided for, but also a provision that there may be rules made for varying the proportions which the classes and numbers specified in the Schedule bear to one another?—Yes.

208. Would not that be sufficient?—It probably is. But we felt that inasmuch as the maximum number had been our practice in the past there was no immediate necessity for departing from that.

Schedule—118 for Madras, 111 for Bombay, and so forth—are numbers which are the result of various adjustments made in each province?—Yes.

210. After consultation with the heads of Local Gov-

209. Those numbers which you find in the first ernments, and after taking all shades of opinion?—Yes.

211. And it is unanimously accepted by the whole of the members of the Southborough Committee on Franchise?—That is so.

212. And to reopen that matter now might possibly lead to undesirable controversies being reopened?—That is quite possible.

213. Do not you think it is desirable that some sort of finality should now be reached without further delay with regard to constituencies and electorates?—What we felt quite frankly was this, that the main substantial proposals of the Report had been subjected to enormous public discussion, but that when we come to the matter which most affects the electorate it is proposed to put this through without any ventilation or any preliminary discussion amongst the interests concerned except to the extent to which they were able to place their views through witnesses before Lord Southborough's Committee.

214. It is the fact, is it not, that the Southborough Report on the question of franchise has been very widely accepted by all sections of opinion in India?—I could not say that; I do not know what has happened.

215. I will pass on to Clause 8. I think your criticism on that was that it omitted Section 79 (3) (e) which required previous sanction for any law affecting religion or religious rites and usages of any class of British subjects in India?—Yes.

216. You have noticed that the clauses affecting status are intended to be made subject to sanction, that is, legislation affecting status is intended to be made subject to the sanction of the Central Government, and that this is merely a matter of drafting. That is in the Schedule with regard to all Indian subjects?—Yes, that is so. The view taken by the Government of India, more particularly in the Legislative Department, was that although that possibly might cover it, it did not cover it with the same definition and clearness as the clause that we propose to introduce. We are desperately afraid of the personal law, the Hindoo and the Mohammedan, being affected in a roundabout way.

217. It is really a matter of drafting?—Very largely.

218. The people who were drafting this, as well as the Government of India and the Legislative Department, are agreed that fundamental questions like questions of status should be made subject to the sanction of the Central authority?—If that is so, I have no more to say.

219. Now I come to a more important Clause, 9 (2). With regard to that there has been a good deal of examination already; that is the effect of the resolutions with regard to the Budget. Is the question of the separate purse versus the joint purse distinct from that, and the effect to be given to resolutions of the Council?—Quite distinct.

220. The latter, that is the effect given to resolutions, is dealt with in Clause 9, sub-clause (2)?—Yes.

221. The question of a separate purse or a joint purse is intended to be provided by rules to be made under under Clause 1, sub-clause D, for the allocation of provincial funds for the purposes of the two parts of the administration—Yes.

222. Rules to be provided for that?—Yes.

223. So that the Bill leaves the question: how such allocation is to be made unprovided for in the body of the Bill, and intends to provide for it by rules to be made under the Bill?—I suggested that in my examination-in-chief.

224. I am just leading up to the point. Therefore I propose to keep the two questions separate. The Joint Report definitely proposed to give power to the Legislative Council to assent to resolutions on the Budget or not?—Yes.

225. The scheme of Budget procedure, as laid down in the Joint Report, is entirely abandoned in the Government of India dispatch of the 5th March of this year, is it not?—It is very materially modified, yes.

226. I think the heading is that it is abandoned: "Report Scheme Abandoned." It is paragraph 69, on page 27. The Budget procedure is dealt with in the Joint Report, in paragraphs 255 to 257. You will notice the last sentence of paragraph 256: "Except in so far as the Governor exercises this power the Budget would be altered in accordance with the resolutions carried in Council." That is the power given by proviso 9 (2) (a) with regard to reserved subjects?—This, as I read it, is a much wider power than the Bill takes. It is intended to be the same as that covered by proviso 1.

227. "The proposals of the Local Government for the appropriation of the provincial revenues in any year shall be submitted to the Council, for its assent, in the form of resolutions: Provided that (a) the Local Government shall have power, in relation to any such resolution, to act as if it had been assented to, notwithstanding the withholding of such assent, if the resolution relates to a reserved subject, and the Governor certifies that the expenditure provided for by the resolution is essential to the discharge of his responsibility for the subject." That is exactly what there is in the last sentence of paragraph 256, is it not?—No.

228. There are more restrictions in the Clause?—No; on the contrary, the Government of India read the last sentence of paragraph 256 of the Joint Report as giving the Legislature a very much wider power than the Bill takes for it, and it was from that point of view that the Government of India's alternative scheme was put forward.

229. I am coming to that, but what I put to you is this, that in paragraph 256, if you look at the two sentences which precede the last: "If the Legislative Council rejects or modifies the proposed allotment for reserved subjects, the Governor should have power to insist on the whole or any part of the allotment originally provided, if, for reasons to be stated, he certifies its necessity in the terms which we have already suggested. We are emphatically of opinion that the Governor in Council must be empowered to obtain the supply which he declares to be necessary for the discharge of his responsibilities. Except in so far as the Governor exercises this power the Budget would be altered in accordance with the resolutions carried in Council."?—Our point was this, that the resolutions carried in Council might affect (a) the revenue estimates which are not touched in the Bill.

230. That was, obviously, the error of the Government of India, was it not, because you will see that Budget is upon the allotments—that is their appropriations of revenue to expenditure?—I do not understand "allotments" to have that exclusive meaning; we were dealing with the estimates as a whole, both for revenue and expenditure. But I waive the point about revenue. What I come to is the further point that under the description given in the report the Government of India apprehend that it would be possible for the Assembly to transfer funds from a reserved head to a transferred head, or vice versa.

231. The Government of India considered that the last sentence in paragraph 256 was put into the Report by inadvertence?—They considered that it was far too wide.

232. I think they said it was put in by an inadvertence, did they not? Will you look at paragraph 73 of the Government of India Despatch of the 5th March?—Yes, because we thought the procedure was far wider than the Report really intended.

233. As to whether there is justification or not, that may be so; but that was considered to be put in by inadvertence?—Yes.

234. Whereas I suggest the whole point of the joint Report was to give to the Legislative Council power to assent to or refuse the resolutions on reserved subjects, as well as transferred subjects, subject only to the Governor's power to override in the case of reserved subjects?—I accept your interpretation.

235. Therefore the scheme, so far as the Government of India is concerned, is a considerable reduction—the Government of India proposed to reduce considerably the powers of control which were intended to be conferred upon the Provincial Legislative Councils?—That is so—which the Report proposed to confer upon them.

236. And the result, apart from the modification which you have said the Government of India will be able to accept now—the effect of the proposals of the Government of India, as made in their despatch of the 5th March, would be this: that the Legislative Council would remain in exactly the same condition as before, that is, under the previous Act, merely an advisory body with regard to finance, both on reserved and transferred subjects, and with regard to legislation, it would have its powers curtailed from what they are now by reason of the Grand Committee procedure?—As regards financial powers, they would remain the same.

237. As regards legislative powers, they would be less than they are now?—On paper less, yes.

238. I mean in law they would be less?—Yes; in law they would be less.

Chairman.] You are speaking of reserved subjects?

Lord Sinha.] I am talking of legislation with regard to every subject.

Witness.] I was under the same misapprehension—that you were dealing with reserved subjects.

239. No. I am speaking of legislation both with regard to reserved and transferred subjects; their powers would be less under the Government of India scheme than they are now?—In regard to legislation, their powers would be less under the Report and under the Government of India scheme than they are now, in so far as they are modified by a possible reference to the Grand Committee.

240. So far as the Report is concerned, their legislative powers would not be less as regards transferred subjects, would they?—I think not.

241. It is only with regard to reserved subjects that the proposal is to institute the Grand Committee procedure?—The Governor has a power to withhold measures which in his opinion seriously affect his own responsibilities even if they deal ostensibly with transferred Departments.

242. Yes; but responsibility for reserved subjects, Clause 9, Sub-Clause 4, deals with Bills relating to reserved subjects which may be referred, and Sub-Clause 5 deals with Bills other than Bills for reserved subjects, which again may be the subject of Grand Committee procedure, provided that they affect the safety or tranquillity of the Province or the interests of a specified reserved subject, so it is always in connection with reserved subjects that the Grand Committee procedure is to be used?—The safety or tranquillity of the Province comes in. That can hardly be called a subject.

243. That is law and order, I suppose, and that is a reserved subject?—Yes.

244. So that practically the two are equivalent expressions, are they not?—I am very anxious that I should not give a wrong answer.

245. I do not want to suggest anything that might mislead?—I understand your questions are directed to examining me as to whether the Government of India's proposals are less favourable to the popular element than the proposals in the Report?

246. Yes. That is what I am showing. With regard to both finance and legislation the powers of the Legislature would be considerably curtailed from what they are now under the Government of India despatch?—As regards finance they are considerably curtailed. As regards legislation the Government of India's

India's despatch follows, for all practical purposes, the proposals in the Report, so that I do not plead guilty to any further reduction.

247. I would not ask you to compare the two, but in fact their legislative powers are more extensive now than they would be under the Government of India's despatch if those proposals of the 5th March were carried out?—That is to say, if you treat the Grand Committee as an integral part of the new procedure, quite so.

Mr. Montagu.

248. Would you elaborate that point? I do not quite follow it. You have assented, I think, to what Lord Sinha said, that the legislative powers given to the Legislative Council as proposed by the Government of India's despatch would be less than they possess now under the existing statute. Is that what you say?—As I understood Lord Sinha's question it was this: Does the proposed legislature possess a lower power in regard to legislation than the Councils under the Minto-Morley system, and I acknowledge that it does if the Grand Committee procedure is taken to be included.

Lord Sinha.

249. I will not trouble you by going into that. The Grand Committee is to be chosen out of the legislature for a particular purpose?—Yes.

250. It is a Committee of the legislature ad hoc in regard to any particular matter, and broadly speaking only for the purpose of carrying a measure which it is anticipated cannot be carried through the Legislative Council?—That is so.

251. That being so, I suppose it is natural that there should be considerable apprehension in Indian political circles as regards the proposals of the Government of India?—I believe there is.

252. The curtailment of the powers of the Legislative Council?—Yes.

253. As regards the power to control, you referred for a memorandum by Sir Dinshaw Wacha and Sir Narayan Chandravarkar and others, which, I understood you to say, shows unrealisable expectations?—I suggested that it shows expectations which it would be impossible to realise in consistence with the declaration of the pronouncement of August, 1917.

254. That memorandum by the Bombay leaders of political opinion was mainly for the purpose of controverting another section of opinion, which contended that there was no substantial reform at all under the joint Report? Is not that so?—That reform was unsatisfactory and insufficient, yes.

255. I think they made a catalogue, a sort of list of about twenty-six items, with regard to which there were some substantial proposals for reform in accordance with what had been long asked for by Indian public opinion. It is on page 129 of Command Paper 123?—I see the reference.

256. The main object of this was to convince the opponents of the reform that they are wrong in suggesting that the report was unsatisfactory?—That is so.

257. With regard to the power to alter the Budget, does not this memorandum lay stress on the fact that that power will depend upon the restraint and wisdom with which proposals to alter are made?—There are some most excellent pronouncements in the course of the memorandum. I only drew attention to two or three particular sentences.

258. What I want to emphasise is this, that it is not really an unrealisable expectation that they are referring to, but an expectation that the proposals to alter the Budget will only be accepted if they are reasonably and wisely made. That is emphasised throughout the memorandum?—One has to take the document as a whole, I quite agree; but I was drawing attention to two sentences which I am sure will be fastened upon by public opinion in India, both now and hereafter, and which, to my mind, led Indian publicists to believe that the joint purse was going to give them full control over the whole of provincial finances, and I said that that was an unrealisable hope so long as responsible Government was not achieved.

259. I am trying to draw attention to the fact that Sir Dinshaw Wacha and Sir Narayan Chandravarkar and others are throughout insisting that the Governor's power to veto, or rather to restore the allotments if altered, with the inquiry which is to be held after definite periods, will exercise such a restraint upon the Legislative Council as to induce them not to propose unreasonable alterations?—Yes, I have no doubt that they have. They are reasonable men, and they put the thing in a reasonable manner.

260. Those Indian publicists, who were talking of control, contemplate that the result of the different proposals in the Report will be to ensure both knowledge and experience of administration far greater than is now possessed by members of the Legislative Council?—I am sure of that; but I do not wish to pin my argument exclusively upon any particular sentences in this or any other memorandum. I refer to the general belief, the general expectation held throughout all circles of Indian politicians that under the joint purse system the popular half of the Government is to be given an effective control over the purse of the official half.

261. Only if the proposals which they make commend themselves to the Governor as reasonable and feasible. Would there be anything wrong in that attitude?—Not at all.

262. Would it not be premature to assume that there will be an unreasonable spirit of hostility to the Budget allotments of the official half of the Government if we remember that the proposals will be now made after considerable discussion in Standing Committees, in all the reserved Departments, with the secretaries familiar with the proposals and with the Minister accepting or acquiescing in the Budget provisions as made by the Executive Council?—If all those agencies are friendly, I see no difficulty; but it is a very large assumption to start with, that you are going to have an absolutely peaceful atmosphere in which this new régime is going to be initiated. I do not want to make any sinister suggestions whatever. All that the Government of India asks for is that we should from the outset avoid possible causes of friction. I do not say there will be friction; we apprehend that there will be, and we do ask that causes of friction should, as far as possible, be eliminated.

263. So far as this particular point is concerned, that is the effect of resolutions with regard to reserved subjects, is not the difference somewhat small? Whereas the popular side says, "Promise to accept our resolutions if they are reasonable," the official side says, "We will not make that promise, but we will accept them and shall accept them if they are reasonable."

Chairman.] Does not everything depend on the interpretation of "reasonable."

Lord Sinha.

264. I expect it does. But what I suggest is this: that the opportunities for being reasonable will be far more, because the opportunities for knowledge of details of administration, now wanting, will be provided for, and are provided for, in the scheme?—I quite agree with that, as a general proposition.

265. So far as reserved subjects are concerned, the Governor's power will be sufficient, I suggest, to prevent effect being given to wild or unreasonable resolutions?—I believe that that power, if constantly and fully exercised, would have that effect, but it casts an enormous burden upon the Governor.

266. Does it not prevent unreasonable resolutions being constantly brought forward?—It depends upon who is the judge of reasonableness.

267. I will come to the question of the separate or joint purse. There are more ways than one of creating a separate purse supposing that a separate purse is decided upon?—Yes.

268. You know of other methods proposed?—Yes, many methods have been proposed.

269. Some have been proposed by expert financial authorities in the India Office?—Yes.

270. It is very much the same as that proposed by Sir Sankaran Nair in his Minute of Dissent on the despatch of the 16th April, I think?—Yes.

271. That is, the entire revenue to be allotted to reserve reserved subjects, and the remaining fraction to transferred subjects?—That is a proposal which has been put forward under high authority.

272. And so far as any question of friction is concerned it will be as free from that as the scheme which you suggest?—That I doubt.

273. You doubt whether it would be as free from the chance of friction?—Yes.

274. I understand the Budget scheme of a joint purse would be perfectly feasible if carried out by reasonable men in a reasonable manner, as the Government of India says?—Quite.

275. Under your scheme, so far as any question of taxation or borrowing is concerned, the Governor is to decide ultimately, after consultation between both halves, as to which half is to borrow or tax, or whether both halves are to borrow or tax?—Yes.

276. And that will depend upon the decision of the Governor entirely, which you expect both halves to accept loyally?—Yes.

277. That is with regard to a division of new sources of revenue, you think both halves would accept loyally the decision of the Governor?—Not a division—the creation of new sources of revenue.

278. It may be a division, because both halves may agree on joint taxation and borrowing and divide it in certain proportions?—That might occasionally happen, but I think it would be very rare.

279. If they are likely to accept loyally the decision as to the creation and probably the division of new sources of revenue, would you not expect that they would accept with equal loyalty a decision of the Governor with regard to the allocation of existing sources of revenue?—No, I should not expect that that would necessarily follow. It seems to me that the two cases are very different. In the case of existing sources of revenue you have a very large fund indeed on which there are enormous claims coming from all sources; the conflict of interests and of demands is enormously multiplied. In the case of the creation of a new tax the issue is an extremely simple one, and it is very simple in the case of a loan. Although a new tax and a new loan do require, according to our proposal, the consent of the Governor, we certainly do not expect that they would be matters of annual occurrence, whereas the other thing is annual—it extends over a very much larger field—and the opportunities for difference of opinion are very great.

280. On the other hand, have you not this fact, that you have the experience of many, many years to guide both parts of the Government in considering as to how much is really necessary for each of the departments?—We have experience of the old official policy, but we understand there is going to be a new heaven and a new earth, and the progressive policy of the popular half of the Government will create demands which we never have had to consider before.

281. Seeing that both are men of the world, men of business, and know that reserved services are as essential for the people as transferred services, and that there must be protection of life and liberty just as much as there must be education, as seeing that the people are that way inclined in the Executive and the Ministry, would you not expect them loyally to accept a decision of the Governor, after full discussion as to the necessities of each department, as to how the revenues should be allocated?—I sincerely trust so, and I believe that the state of affairs which you describe will arrive in time; but I say it is far too much, with human nature constituted as it is, to expect that it will be an atmosphere in which this thing will begin. All that we propose to do is to lay down safeguards and precautions against immediate trouble. The joint purse is only one of them. It is quite possible that the separate purse, 15 or 20 years hence, will yield to the joint purse. But we object to starting—I do not use the phrase in an offensive sense—with a happy-go-lucky idea that everything will go well, and finding afterwards that things go badly. We would rather prepare all the ammunition we can against trouble and trust that it will be unnecessary in the near future.

282. May I suggest that it might create trouble if you began with a fear or a suspicion that there will be a great deal of unreasonableness—that that in itself might be a cause of trouble?—I trust not. We do not display our suspicions.

283. Might it not meet the purpose which I am sure both you and I have in view if there was this power given to the Governor in case of agreement being impossible to refer the question to an impartial tribunal or to make a rule for that purpose?—That is to say, to enable a separate purse to be instituted if the Governor finds that he cannot work the joint purse?

284. Yes, an allocation to be made, not by the Governor's decision if he finds there is unwillingness to accept it, but an allocation to be made by some outside method or means—to try whether people will be reasonable, and if evidence is found that they are being unreasonable, then to exercise the power of calling in an outside body to decide?—That is, to initiate a separate purse?

285. Yes?—That is a conceivable compromise.

286. It might prevent the fear or suspicion which I am suggesting might be the result of beginning with a separate purse?—I quite see your point.

287. In the Government of India's scheme, which I am afraid I am always calling your scheme, the Government proposes to make the division of subjects a basis for the allocation of revenue?—Yes.

288. The division of subjects as made by the Feetham Committee, has nothing to do with revenue; it is not based on any proportion of revenue, or anything of that sort?—No; it deals entirely with functions.

289. And therefore it seems to me that to make a separate purse on the basis of that division might be erroneous, or, at any rate, not warranted by the fact of division into subjects?—Functions include the collection of revenue, and all we suggest is that the revenues which are entrusted to them for assessment and collection should be at their disposal. The two things are very much interlaced.

290. Need it be so, because the Reserve Department, for instance, has, as you have said in answer to Captain Ormsby Gore, about 75 per cent. or 80 per cent. of the revenue?—Of the expenditure, I think I said.

291. Therefore there must have been more of the revenue, because the first charge is upon that?—In some provinces more, and in some less.

292. But a very large proportion of the revenue will be in the Reserve Department?—We worked out an imaginary separate purse for Bombay, and there we found that the revenues were high in proportion to the expenditure on the transferred side—that the transferred side, in other words, would have to make a subsidy to the reserved.

293. But, ordinarily it will be the other way about, will it not?—I have not examined them with care. In the United Provinces it is almost equality. There will be no transfer. The revenues derived from the functions which the Feetham Committee assigns to Ministers would cover their expenditure and leave them with a substantial surplus, and so on the other side of the Government.

294. And the adjustment from one side to the other, whichever it may be, will always create a certain amount of friction, in any case?—It will be a matter for discussion. But the point which I beg you to remember is that that adjustment will be made on the basis of the known figures, the known needs and expenditure of the two halves of the Government in the past, whereas the allocation to be made by the Governor is a hypothetical allocation on the demands for the next year. There is, I think, substance in the argument.

295. As regards the stimulus to develop each other's resources, it might be looked at from another point of view, might it not, that both sides should have an interest in the development of the whole revenue?—I urge the advantage of the stimulus of developing one's own resources, not each other's.

296. And to develop the whole if it belongs to both?—Yes.

297. That would also be a kind of stimulus?—That is a stimulus, but not so powerful as the other.

298. The quantity or degree of it might differ?—Yes.

299. What you call meddlesomeness might also be called, I suppose, advice; because advice, if not accepted, is likely to be considered meddlesome?—May

I try to describe the difference between the two? What I had in my mind when I spoke about meddlesomeness was a case of this sort. Again I come back—and I apologise for referring to it—to the classic instance of excise. A Minister undertakes a heroic excise policy, which his colleagues on the official side of the Government, though they sympathise with his motives, believe to be impracticable. What I mean by meddlesomeness is his official colleague coming into his office every second day and protesting against some order which has been issued in his (the Minister's) department in regard to excise, threatening to take it to the Governor, demanding a meeting of the full Government to consider it, and urging his colleague, possibly in a somewhat oppressive manner, to modify the details of his policy. That I regard as meddlesomeness to be avoided. On the other hand, I welcome to the fullest degree the widest consultation between the two halves of the Government in regard to matters of broad and general policy. That, I think, is the distinction which I attempted to draw. I think the one thing is objectionable and the other is part of the scheme.

300. That might happen in whatever system there is, whether a joint or separate purse?—There is no reason why it should happen in the case of a separate purse, because the Minister becomes responsible himself for whatever the details of his policy may be, and there is no reason why his official colleague should object to it, because it does not affect him.

301. So far as taking part in the discussion is concerned, I suppose he might. However, I will leave it there. As regards friction, for five months in the year which you speak of that will invariably be there because the Standing Committee on Finance and the Standing Committee in the other reserved departments will have to have all these matters placed before them, I take it?—I do not see why there should be friction if each half knows it can draw only to a certain extent on the revenues.

302. Friction in the sense of a suggestion that a department is spending more than it ought, there will be, because you are bound to put these proposals for discussion before Standing Committees both in Finance and other matters?—That, I think, happens independently of any Budgetary arrangement.

303. What I suggest is, if they want to make controversy they can always do it, because you are going to have Standing Committees in these things?—That would happen independently of any Budgetary arrangements.

304. Therefore you will not have any more wrangles by a Budget being brought before the whole Council and Ministry than you would otherwise. That is all I want to suggest. I am afraid you will not get rid of the wrangles as long as you have the procedure laid down in the Bill of Standing Committees and so on. I will go on now to the next point about Grand Committees. I think you have just touched upon that. I suggest to you that the Government of India in their despatch has not paid sufficient attention to the nature and composition of the Legislative Council now proposed, and I say so for this reason. Take Bengal, for instance, which has 125 members of the Legislative Council. In constituting their Grand Committee, which will be 50, the Government suggests that as they have only 16 officials available and they will have to nominate 26 out of the 50 to have a bare majority, they will have a difficulty in finding the non-officials to be nominated in order to have that majority?—That is an argument.

305. Because they say 24 will be elected?—Yes.

306. But of these 24 at least 6 or 7 will be European members elected by the 15 or 16 European members of the Legislative Council, who I expect will be, on a Bill such as is referred to a Grand Committee, on the side of the Government in respect of measures affecting peace and tranquillity?—We should deplore any general assumption of that sort, because it would make the controversy before the Grand Committee practically a racial controversy.

307. I am suggesting this, that there is no reason to assume that all the elected members of the Grand Committee will be against the Government view in regard to the nature of the Bill that would be referred to the Grand Committee. I suggest that assumption as unfounded, having regard to the composition of the legislative bodies now to be constituted. You assume, do you not, that all the elected members may be against the Government?—We have made that assumption, yes.

308. Of course, you may say I am wrong, but I suggest, having regard to the nature and composition of the Councils, that that assumption is unfounded and ought not to be made?—We had to assume that in the matter of legislation which had produced great popular excitement and opposition, the members of the Grand Committee who would be elected by the non-official members of the Council would find themselves inevitably, for all practical purposes, in opposition to the measure.

309. But they are to be elected by transferable votes, so that all the sections of the Legislative Council will be represented in the Grand Committee?—Take Bengal and look at their composition. With a Grand Committee of 50 you have to nominate 10 members in order to secure the bare majority which the Report proposes. We demurred entirely to the suggestion that those 10 should be drawn from European or similar interests. We felt that nominations had to be directed to securing representation.

310. Perhaps I am taking you off, but I suggest it may not be necessary to draw upon Europeans for the nominated side because you will have European elected members on the side of the Government amongst the 24?—If we assume they are on the side of the Government, you may have some European members in the Bengal Council, but there are Councils in which the European interests will hardly be represented even by the transferable vote.

311. In all the bigger Provinces there are large European elements represented?—Not to the extent you have in Bengal, I think.

312. No; not so large?—We are very anxious to avoid any anchoring of our hopes on racial grounds.

313. And further, you have the whole of the elected as well as the nominated non-officials to choose from, a fact which I think is not taken sufficient account of by the Government of India. It is not necessarily from the nominated non-officials but also from the elected. Nominations are to be made from the nominated members?—Yes.

314. I suggest that you might very well extend your choice and make them from both elected and nominated members, and in that way the difficulty will disappear?—The nominated members are very few in some Provinces.

315. But if you extend your choice also to the elected members the difficulty would disappear. You said the Government of India is looking for a senatorial electorate?—Yes.

316. They have not found one yet?—They have not been authorised to find one.

317. But they are looking for one, I thought?—No; they are waiting for instructions.

318. The kind of electorate which you suggest would mean, in Madras, for example, about 1,500 out of about 40,000,000, taking the high property qualifications, and so on. I think that is the kind of thing suggested?—Yes.

319. Over an area of 123,000 square miles?—That is the area of Madras, is it?

320. Yes. Is it possible for any candidates to get into touch with 1,500 people scattered over 123,000 square miles? Would not it be a negation of all principles of direct election?—I ought to explain that this suggestion is put forward purely as an indication of the type of thing that we anticipate. We have not had an opportunity of consulting Local Governments about it even.

321. Would the effect be to restrict it to territorial magnates, plutocrats and perhaps a small leaven of persons otherwise distinguished?—It would be to restrict the electorate to certain definite qualifications of a high character.

322. Of the character which I mentioned?—I do not think that they would be exclusive; we might have high educational qualifications, senates of universities.

323. I said "otherwised highly distinguished"?—Yes.

324. It would be very unacceptable to Indian opinion, would it not, such a Chamber as that?—I do not press for that particular Chamber. What we press for is something which is elected in a different way from the elected members of the Lower House.

325. If

325. If the purpose of the Council of State is the same as for a Grand Committee would it not be possible to devise some kind of Grand Committee instead of a Second Chamber like the Council of State?—That is quite possible; but it dispenses altogether with the existence of what you may require afterwards—a Second House.

326. Supposing you decide not to have a Second House either in the provinces or in the Central Legislature, the purpose immediately in view may be served by something like a Grand Committee?—That would be the next best solution, I should think.

327. With regard to Clause 21, I think the only objection about the qualifications that the Government of India refers to is that they would prefer the legal qualifications to be retained?—They have also suggested that two Indians should be prescribed by law.

328. With regard to both these suggestions, may I put this to you? If the present qualifications—that is, a barrister of so many years standing, and so on—remain, that would exclude people in India who have quite as good qualifications as barristers, would it not?—That is a very controversial question. I am not in a position to express an opinion.

329. Perhaps I am wrong in putting it to you in that way, but it would exclude people—Indians—who had not been qualified by admission to the English Bar?—And who are very highly thought of in their profession. I accept that.

330. Men, for example, like a gentleman you know very well, Sir Rash Bihari Ghose, or the late Sir Bhayeshyam Ayangar, of Madras?—I quite accept that.

331. It would have the effect of excluding men like that?—Yes, this particular formula would have.

332. And in that way would be undesirable?—I think this formula may want modification. What we ask for is that legal qualifications should still be insisted upon.

333. Then with regard to the statutory provision for two Indians, do not you think that might have the effect of cutting down the number of Indians who might otherwise be found capable of being in the Executive Council?—I am afraid I do not follow the question.

334. If you said there must be a restriction with regard to the number of Indians in the Council or rather that there must be a provision definitely fixing two, the minimum would be taken as the maximum?—I think the present Act——

335. The present Act has no racial qualifications?—No; I see your point.

336. Therefore I suggest it would be better not to have any definition of the number of seats on the Executive Council open to Indians?—I see; yes.

337. Do you think the Government of India has any serious objection to the demand which has been put forward consistently that as in the provinces so in the Imperial Executive Council or the Indian Executive Council the numbers should be half and half?—The Government of India have not considered that point.

338. Do you think personally there would be any objection to that?—I should not like to express an opinion on the subject.

339. With regard to Clause 23, which, I think you said, gave extraordinarily wide powers to the Secretary of State in Council, do you think the Government of India would agree to the proposition that the Secretary of State should, by rule, give up the right to control all matters of legislation, administration, and finance in which the Legislature, the Government of India, and the Executive of the Government of India agree?—The Government of India have been considering this question, and I am not fully seised of their views at present

340. Then I will not ask that——

Chairman.

341. Do not you think that in connection with the kind of subject referred to by our friend Lord Sinha it is a little misleading to use the words "reasonable" and "unreasonable"? Is not the real question we have to consider those differences of opinion which are an inevitable part of politics?—That is the difficulty—who is to say what is reasonable and what is unreasonable on either side?

Mr. Montagu.

342. The first question I want to put to you is this: When the scheme upon which this Bill was founded was being prepared you were Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces?—I was.

343. Could you tell the Committee something of the consultation which went on with you and the other heads of the provinces, and the degree to which at that stage, in principle, anyhow, unanimity was reached?—When the inquiry first started in India there had been no chance of communication between the heads of the provinces. An attempt was made to establish such communication, but it came to very little. But in the end the heads of all provinces except Burma were summoned to Delhi in, I think January 1918, were addressed by the Secretary of State and the Viceroy, and set to work there and then to try and arrive at at least the outlines of a scheme which they could put before the inquiry. Such an outline was arrived at, and was accepted, subject to, I think, a minor qualification on behalf of the Punjab, and the complete dissent of Lord Pentland, and was placed before yourself and the Viceroy, and, although I have not that document with me, it probably is on the record; but the essential feature of the document was, and the essential feature of our understanding was, that although some of us wanted a longer period of preparation than others, we did all agree that when the first Statutory Commission visited India it should find Diarchy working in all our Provinces. There were details which I do not suppose you wish me to allude to.

344. At that time, on the supposition that the 20th August declaration was to be taken as a starting point, the majority of the heads of the local Governments were prepared at some time or other to face the Diarchic system?—Most clearly.

345. It would not be fair to ask you about the degree, shall I say, of complicity of the members of the Government of India in the scheme as published. In the big despatch of March 5th, in paragraph 7, these words occurred: "Members of the Government of India were indeed kept in close touch with the deliberations, and no important conclusions were arrived at without reference to them." You know enough about what occurred then to say that that is by no means an overstatement of the facts?—So far as I had any part in these preliminary discussions the Government of India as a whole was always a participant.

346. And, therefore, on the assumption that the joint purse and the separate purse were discussed at that stage, the views on that and similar subjects in the despatch represent second thoughts after consideration and criticism?—I think so, yes.

347. The Report had been published for a year, I think, roughly, and criticism had come from two different sources, the local Governments, on the one hand, who sent in these despatches, which have now been published, and the non-officials, who had been passing resolutions of various kinds in their various representative assemblies or organisations, and it was the criticism of both kinds that the Government of India took into account?—Yes.

348. Could you just explain whether it is, or how far it is, true to say that the result of criticising the local Government's criticism led the Government of India to go further away in a direction which the local Governments did not like; and the result of considering the non-official criticism was, so far as I can discover, to recommend the adoption of no single point that the critics made?—Is that in regard to the financial arrangements?

349. Anything. I do not know if I have made myself clear. The Government of India were to a great extent participants in the original scheme; they have now suggested modifications, as the result, you have agreed, of criticism. Those modifications have been in no sense what the local Governments suggested—or perhaps you can show me where I am wrong—and in no sense what the non-officials have suggested. How does that come about?—I do not know that the latter statement is not subject to some modification. I can lay hands upon definite protests on the part of non-official critics against the financial proposals, for example. A strong point was made of the impropriety of leaving Ministers to be fed, as it was called, by the crumbs from the table of the official half of the Government. But speaking generally, and waiving any incidental support of that character what I would say is this, that the criticisms on all sides forced the Government of India into a very minute and detailed examination of the details in practical working of the scheme, and compelled them to try and visualise it in its everyday admistrative aspect. Although it may be true in individual respects that they have not followed one set of critics or the other, they have endeavoured to make the scheme a working plan in all its minute ramifications. I cannot say—I should be wrong in saying—that they have slavishly followed any particular body of criticism. The fact is that the great bulk of criticism was self-contradictory, and the criticisms destroyed each other, and in many cases we had to start as if we were working on a clean sheet.

350. This point is so important to me that I am afraid I must press you a little further. Let us take the general consensus of opinion so far as it can be judged from here—of Indian non-official opinion on this Report. Am I right in saying that on the whole as time has gone on it has become more favourable?—I think it has.

351. Am I not right in saying that nearly the whole of it has expressed the view that the Bill does too little in the fabric of the Government of India itself?—Undoubtedly.

352. Your answer to that has been not to suggest anything more about the Government of India, but to suggest something less by objecting to standing Committees and Under Secretaries. You do not see your way to meet them in that line of criticism on one single point?—We founded our proposals in that respect upon one of the axioms in the Report, which lays it down that "The Government of India must remain wholly responsible to Parliament, and, saving such responsibilty, its authority in essential matters must remain indisputable, pending experience of the effect of the changes now introduced in the provinces." Taking that as a general statement of very wide application, and of infinitely more authority than some of the details which were either suggested or criticised, we have attempted to make the scheme consonant with that declaration. That is the only answer I can give.

353. There was no alteration in the proposals made as to the Central Government that could be conceived to be consistent with that declaration?—There was nothing more generous than what we suggested in our despatch.

354. Take the Local Governments, as I understand it the majority of the Local Government came to you and said, "We dislike Diarchy; we want a unitary system of Government," and your answer to that appeai seems to have been to have made a greater duality of Government. So that both sets of critics came to you and got no satisfaction?—Our complaint against the majority of the Local Governments was that their scheme was infinitely less generous than ours with regard to the structure of the Provincial Executive.

355. I will put it to you very tentatively. Are not the modifications suggested by the Government of India in all things due to their own reconsideration of the question rather than to the criticism which has been put to them from outside—I think that is broadly true.

356. I want to ask you one more question before we adjourn. The points to which I want to direct your attention more in detail than any other points are the relative merits of a dual form of government and a united form of government. For that purpose, would you be kind enough before we meet to-morrow morning to look through your evidence, to see the arguments that you used against the joint purse, and to consider how far those arguments against the joint purse would be equally applicable to a united Government. Do you see what I mean?—Yes.

357. Of course, you could not have a separate purse, I imagine, with a united Government?—No.

358. But I think it was Lord Islington who put to you if you did not have a separate purse what was the point of a separate Government?—I see.

359. And would not the united purse and the united Government taken together be open to some of the objections which you have pointed out as arising under a dual form of government and a united purse?—I see.

MEMBERS PRESENT:—

Duke of NORTHUMBERLAND.	Mr. BENNETT.
Marquess of CREWE.	Sir HENRY CRAIK.
Earl of SELBORNE.	Mr. MONTAGU.
Lord BRODRICK (Viscount Midleton).	MAJOR ORMSBY GORE.
Lord ISLINGTON.	Sir J. D. REES.
Lord SYDENHAM.
Lord SINHA.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE EARL OF SELBORNE IN THE CHAIR.

Chairman.] Before resuming the evidence of Sir James Meston, I wish to make a statement which I hope the Press will take note of. It is rendered necessary by many of the communications received by the Secretariat. It is this: This is not a Committee to inquire into the state of India or into the Government of India, or to report on the best form of Government for India. Neither is it a Committee to do again the work done by the Southborough Committee. It is a Select Committee of the two Houses of Parliament dealing with the Government of India Bill, according to strict Parliamentary precedent and procedure, and no evidence of any sort or kind by whomsoever tendered will be admitted which goes beyond the scope of the Committee's terms of reference. I also wish to make it quite plain that the Committee is working under a time limit, and therefore there must be a very strict scrutiny as to those who tender themselves as witnesses. Evidence can only be admitted of gentlemen really representative of large and important interests. It is quite impossible to allow evidence to be tendered by every lady or gentleman who is interested in Indian affairs. And also there must be a strict limit to the number of witnesses heard in evidence on behalf of even large and important interests.

SIR JAMES MESTON, K.C.S.I., is recalled; and further Examined, as follows:—

Chairman.

360. I think you wish to correct something you said yesterday?—Yes. I should be most grateful if you would allow me to correct an error into which I fell in answering a question of Lord Sinha's. The question in the transcript which I have just got is No. 337. Lord Sinha asked whether the Government of India had had any objection to a proposal which would leave the Imperial Executive Council constituted half of officials and half of Indians. In my reply I said that the point had not been considered. My memory failed me, because the point had been considered, and is dealt with, though very briefly, in paragraph 113 of the Government of India's dispatch of the 5th March. I should like, if I may, to have my evidence amended accordingly. In the second place I would like, with your Lordship's permission, to hand in a statement which clears up certain difficulties that were felt yesterday in regard to the earmarking of expenditure or revenues under the financial system which the Government of India had advocated. This is a statement showing in quite a rough and informal manner how a separate purse could be prepared for two exemplar provinces. (The same is handed in. See Appendix B.)

Mr. Montagu.

361. I have only a very few more questions to ask. My first is this: When the report on which this Bill is based was published for criticism you, I think, agreed to the appointment by the Indian Legislative Council of a Committee to consider the report?—Yes; the Government of India did.

362. And you received a report from them suggesting certain amendments, which are printed as an appendix to the Government of India dispatch?—Yes.

363. You also received what is called the final opinion of the European Association?—Yes.

364. Also printed in the Blue Book. You also received the criticisms of the Local Governments. Now, you conferred with the Local Governments at Delhi?—Yes.

365. Did you confer with the members of the Legislative Council, or of the European Association, on the points which they had suggested?—No; not since I have been a member of the Government of India.

366. You were present at the meetings of the Heads of Local Governments at Delhi this year, I think?—Yes.

367. Was there any attempt made to bridge over the difference of opinion between you?—Very strenuous attempts were made.

368. And it was found to be impossible?—Five Heads of Local Governments found it impossible to arrive at any conclusion which was consistent with what we regarded as the fundamental principle of the scheme; two Heads of Local Governments were entirely in agreement with it.

369. Entirely in agreement with the proposals in the report, or entirely in agreement with your amendments of the proposals in the report?—They were entirely in agreement with the fundamental principle of Diarchy. That was the main issue before us.

370. No Local Government suggested to you, did they, your arrangements for the finance of the provincial Government?—No.

371. Or for the abandonment of the proposals for Under Secretaries and Standing Committees in the Government of India?—No.

372. There was, of course, a difference of principle between you and the Heads of the five Local Governments?—A vital difference of principle, yes.

373. Is it fair to the Government of India to say that all their efforts have been directed to keeping the constitutional changes, so far as they relate to real power, to the transferred subjects in the Provinces and maintaining everything else much as it is to-day?—If I may put it in this way, I think that the dominant consideration of the Government of India has been that Diarchy affords an opportunity to the new popular Government to undertake work of a very real and responsible character within its own field, and that the Government of India consider that that opportunity is sufficient for the first stage of the new régime, and that development from that stage would naturally follow by the increase of the size of the field. They recognise that with the popular vote and the presence of Ministers in the Government the influence of the popular Government upon the administration of reserved subjects must steadily grow, but their proposals are directed against converting that influence into control.

374. Quite, and for that reason, in the Presidencies, at any rate, you would like to keep the Executive Council as it is to-day?—Yes.

375. Would you like to keep the composition of the Grand Committees of the Legislative Councils so as to reproduce exactly the position as it is to-day?—Well, as nearly as possible; it is impossible to reproduce it exactly.

376. You were not unanimous, of course, in your despatch, but there was less unanimity about the proposal with regard to the Executive Councils than any other, I think?—Yes, there were two members who felt difficulties about it.

377. Is not one of the difficulties in the Executive Council always that there is a demand on the one side or the other for equality of numbers?—There is a demand on the non-official side for equality of numbers.

378. Is not there always an objection also on the official side to increasing the Indian members to such an extent that they would be in a majority?—Oh, yes.

379. So that it really works both ways?—Yes.

380. I think you said, in answer to Lord Islington yesterday, that as a consequence of that you did not see what the next stage in the Local Government scheme was going to be?—Yes.

381. Because an increase in the numbers would mean complete control to the Indian members of the Executive Council by voting straight?—That had reference to the increase in the number of the non-official Councillors drawn from the popular Assembly.

382 And therefore you thought that that would not be the next stage?—Yes.

383. Could I press you to express your opinion: What do you think would be the next stage?—Under the system of composite Government?

384. Yes?—I could not conceive any other stage except that, and that stage I regard as extrmely dangerous.

385. Is it not possible at least that the next stage might be Diarchy after all?—My submission was that the type of composite Government described by Lord Islington was practically Diarchy inasmuch as there is a division of functions.

Lord Islington.

386. A very different Diarchy from what you are proposing?—Yes, but a dualism.

Mr. Montagu.

387. You will agree with me that it is very important that whatever we do should be acceptable to some body in India?—Yes.

388. What do you think would be the effect on public opinion in India, so far as you are able to judge it, of the adoption of the Local Government scheme as it stands?—I have seen very little expression of public criticism upon the Local Government scheme. In so far as it approaches the original proposal of the Congress of the League, I presume that certain features in it would be acceptable, but certain others would certainly be most unacceptable to those who stood by the Congress League scheme. And inasmuch as the great bulk of moderate opinion in India has associated itself closely with the principle of dualism, I should hardly expect them to gladly accept the change now proposed. But what I think is even more important, and would probably weigh more heavily with Indian opinion, is the certainty that a vital fundamental alteration of the scheme in the direction suggested by certain heads of Local Governments would very gravely delay the initiation of any measures that are now going to be taken under this Bill. We have had a year to prepare the details of the working of dualism; we have not nearly completed the details of the scheme, and if we have to cast the whole of that over and start anew with an entirely different series of proposals it would be some considerable time before anything in the nature of executive action could be taken under it.

389. In any form of Government of which you have been a member is not there normally an amicable discussion among the members of it as to the allocation of available supply?—My experience is a little limited in that respect. The only Government for which I was responsible was for six years that of the United Provinces, where, as you know, there was no Executive Council. It was a single-handed Administration, and there, I confess, I was very rarely, as Head of

of the Provinces appealed to, because the Departments managed to arrange their difficulties between themselves with the help of a strong Finance Secretary. Now in the Government of India, with which now I am at least equally familiar, the financial dispositions of the year hardly ever come before the Council at all until they are in the final form in which the Finance Department suggests that they should be presented to the Secretary of State for approval. There, again, the Departments settle their own affairs very largely among themselves.

390. They settle it by discussion among themselves?—By discussion among themselves with, as I say, the help of a strong Finance Department.

391. Is that what you would call meddlesomeness or a wrangle?—Oh, no, there is no wrangle; there is a good deal of soreness sometimes.

392. Take any Government in any country: Suppose you were at the head of a spending department, let us say the Education Department, would it not be natural that you should view with great jealousy proposals for increased expenditure, let us say, on the Army?—I have no doubt I should.

393. Would your jealousy be greater or less if you you were excluded from the discussion of the expenditure on the Army with a view to cutting it down?—If my power of influencing the administration existed it would certainly be greater.

394. You must have a joint purse; you cannot have a separate purse in a unitary Government, I presume?—No; a joint purse would be the natural consequence of a unitary Government.

395. This is the point I left yesterday: Would not the wrangles be much worse than they would be under a dual Government?—I think the difficulties of a joint purse under a composite Government would be just as great as they are under the dual system. There, perhaps, would not be the same uncertainty as to the future expansion of revenues, but there would certainly be the same temptation to meddlesomeness, the same tendency to wrangling which we have talked about, and there would certainly be the same friction. Even under a composite Government it is this friction which would be the rock on which, I think, the whole scheme would break, because all the non-official members would be exercising a constant pull for greater economies in the Departments with which they are not immediately concerned, and in doing that they would have the Assembly behind them, so that the whole weight of the Assembly would be behind one particular section of the Government as against the other, and at any moment you might have a crisis for which I can see no possible solution.

396. But would not it be worse in view of the fact that all the members of the Government would be equally responsible for all decisions?—Quite so; they would all have to defend each decision.

397. They would all be equally responsible, and they would have an equal share in anything coming to them?—Yes.

398. One more question about the joint and separate purse. Supposing a Legislative Council moved a resolution under your scheme—I am taking the Government of India scheme now in its entirety—to reduce expenditure on a reserved head—an advisory resolution, as it would be—and supposing the Governor accepted that resolution as being right, there would be a reduction in the expenditure, and the money would, I think, go into the reserved balances, and might be used as an argument for a reduction in the reserved allotment when the next settlement came?—Undoubtedly.

399. But in the meanwhile it would be there to swell the balances?—Yes.

400. I am postulating a case in which everybody is in agreement that too much has been taken, at any rate in that year, for the reserved head, and therefore the resolutions have been accepted. At the same moment the transferred head might be crying out for new expenditure. They could not touch the money in the balance, and would therefore have to resort to taxation. Is not that a true picture of what might happen?—I would modify it to this extent, that under the separate purse scheme there would be two separate balances; each half of the Government will have its own balances just as its own resources, and its own powers of taxation, and your question, if I may say so, assumes that the Ministers have completely depleted their own balance. The Government of India would certainly hold that in those circumstances the moment for improving their resources had arrived, in any case, without reference to the adventitious addition of the balances of the other half of the Government.

401. Then you think it unachievable, at any rate, in a Provincial Government in India, that money saved by one department should be available for another?—Oh, no; I do not go so far as that. I think probably you put the case from what I believe will be the strictly proper point of view, but it is not at all inconceivable that given the amicable relations which we hope are going to grow as paving the way from a separate purse to a possible future joint purse, you will frequently have arrangements by which one half of the Government accommodates the other half with any surplus funds which may be at its disposal. I thing that is a contingency which we may certainly regard as probable.

402. My last question to you on this subject would be this: You postulate even under your separate purse proposal some give and take between the two halves of the Government?—Yes.

403. Now, is not your only real reason for your separate purse proposal a fear that this wrangle may become so unfriendly that there is no solution?—That expresses the fear that I entertain regarding an enforcement from the outset of the joint purse.

404. But would it not be more logical to take the proposal put to you by Lord Sinha yesterday, that, instead of safeguarding yourself against the fear that the usual departmental discussions—discussions which you have admitted are usual—would lead to quarrels, you should provide machinery in case those quarrels were to occur. Is not that more logical?—I do not contest that as a perfectly reasonable proposition.

405. I must ask, I am afraid, three more questions. You were talking about the recommendation that the Government of India made that there should be a statutory enactment for the appointment of two Indians or one Indian, to the Executive Council, as the case may be?—Two Indians on the Imperial Council and one on the Provincial was the suggestion.

406. Why do you suggest it should be statutory?—It is very largely to meet the feeling that the statutory provision at the present is wholely one-sided. We desire to retain a statutory provision which will secure us at least two in one case and one in the other, members of the public services. If this is resented we are quite prepared to make a corresponding statutory provision for non-official Indians. That is the only reason.

407. But, as a matter of fact, since the Morley-Minto Report there have been Executive Councils appointed, and there has never been any doubt that, although it was not statutory, they would continue as they are?—That is so.

408. And it is true, is it not, that even if you had your statutory prescription of the 12 years' service or 10 years' service, that does not exclude Indians who possess that qualification?—Not at all.

409. You said yesterday that you agreed that the proposals as regards the Legislature put the Legislature in a worse position than they were to-day as regards legislation?—Yes.

410. And you said that that was due to the fact of the Grand Committee procedure. That is all, is it not?—That is all.

411. That is so important a statement that I want to pursue it a little further. You would not wish to put the Legislature from the point of view of legislation in a worse position than it is in to-day, would you?—No.

412. That would be clearly out of spirit with the whole enterprise?—Yes.

413. If that is your view, why did not the Government of India suggest an alteration?—I think my answer has been read as though I had taken Lord Sinha's question in a somewhat artificial and narrow sense. What I understood Lord Sinha to ask was whether the Legislature, apart from the Grand Committee, had the same powers under the Bill as the Legislature

Legislature has by law at present, and my reply was that it had not, inasmuch as certain measures of legislation can, under the proposed scheme, be withdrawn from the Legislature, which is not the case at present. But if one develops the proposition one sees at once the essential difference between the two positions, inasmuch as at present the Legislature has an official strength which secures its capacity for passing practically any laws that are put before it by the Executive Government.

414. So that if instead of talking of the Legislature you talk of the elected members of the Legislature, they have enormously greater powers?—Infinitely greater. I never contested that point.

415. I only wanted to clear up the point?—Quite so; I am very grateful to you.

416. It was very important, I think. There are two respects in which their powers are increased, one in their numbers, and another in the relaxation of the requirements of the previous sanction for the introduction of legislation?—That is so.

417. And even when we come to the Grand Committee, as proposed in the Report, at any rate they have more powers than they have at present on the Grand Committee?—Undoubtedly.

418. And if the Government of India's emendation of the Grand Committee were accepted, it would be as nearly as possible the same as at present?—As nearly as possible, yes.

419. I now want to ask you just a question or two about the rules under the Bill. I think it was Mr. Bennett who asked you whether there was any matter which it was proposed to deal with by rules under the Bill which you would have preferred to see dealt with in the clauses of the Bill itself. May I repeat that question?—I think my answer was that there are some matters of very considerable importance which we do desire to see provided for in a formal and authoritative manner, but whether those ought to go into the Bill, or whether they ought to take the form of statutory rules under the Bill is a matter which the Government of India confidently leave to the draughtsmen and the exigencies of Parliamentary procedure.

420. One of the matters to be dealt with by rules is, of course, the division of functions?—Yes.

421. You have suggested the exclusion of secondary education from the list of transferred subjects?—Yes.

422. Did you regard that as being in harmony with the principles which the Report suggests ought to guide one in selecting the transferred subjects?—What we felt was that the control of primary and, to put it quite informally, vernacular education is a matter which is much nearer the people and much more directly under their control than the infinitely more difficult and more technical questions involved in secondary and University education. We felt, speaking quite frankly, that so many mistakes have been made in India in the past in the organisation of secondary, and more particularly University, work—mistakes which we believe have been made in other countries as well—that we are frankly anxious for an opportunity to remedy them before we hand over probably the most difficult of all subjects to the new popular Government. I do not think I can put the matter more succinctly than that.

423. I do not want at this stage, because it is a publication since you left India, to take you through all the questions involved in the Report of Lord Crewe's Committee, but I would ask you this question: Do you assent to the principle that where the Government of India acts in conformity with the wishes of the Legislative Assembly it should not be controlled from England?—I find great difficulty in accepting that principle broadly. But I have to confess that, largely owing to physical reasons, I have been unable to study either the Report or the comments that have been made upon it, and I should be most grateful if I might have a subsequent opportunity of answering this question, because, apart from other things, I am still in the position of being only the representative of the Government of India, and I am not familiar with their views on this particular point.

424. My last question to you would be about Lord Southborough's Report on the Franchise. As I understand it, that Report was unanimous with the exception of the question of Women's Franchise?—It was certainly a point on which the report was not unanimous.

425. As I understand it, in every case the recommendations that they made in each Province were based on the recommendations of the Local Governments and were concerted with them?—I understand that to have been the ordinary procedure.

426. It is not the intention of the Government of India to do that work all over again, is it?—Not at all.

427. You do not want to re-submit the proposals to the Local Governments over again, do you?—In regard to some details we should like to consult the Local Governments, more particularly with reference to their silence regarding the constituencies for the Central Assembly.

428. One of the things which interests me is this: In your comments upon Lord Southborough's Report you suggest a modification of the Mohammedan representation in Bengal?—Yes.

429. Now Lord Southborough and his colleagues base themselves upon what I have always understood to be a voluntary agreement between certain Mohammedans and certain Hindoos made at Lucknow?—Yes.

430. Now if you want to alter or modify that agreement, is it because you think the Mohammedans who entered into it were not representative of Mohammedan opinion?—I am most grateful to you for asking that question. It gives me, if I may take it, an opportunity of countering, of strenuously countering, a suggestion that has been made that the Government of India, in making the proposals they did, had in view the rejection of the Lucknow compact. There was nothing further from their minds. They fully, and I think almost unanimously, decided to abide by the Lucknow compact as a political document of new and rare importance, and of great value, and very highly regarded by the politically minded members of both communities. There was no intention whatever of going behind the compact or breaking it. During the discussion, however, it was pointed out that for reasons which it would be profitless to discuss now, the Mohammedans of Eastern Bengal felt that they had fared somewhat badly in the agreement that was arrived at at Lucknow. They asked for treatment which they had not received under their own compact, and having regard both to those facts and to the actual population statistics, we endeavoured to meet what seemed to us their perfectly legitimate request by a suggestion that we should add a certain number of seats to the Mohammedan representation in Bengal alone. I may say this, that if we had thought for a moment that this proposal was to be treated seriously as an attempt to break the compact we should probably not have put it forward.

431. Would you have been very shocked if Lord Southborough's Committee had suggested Women's Suffrage in India?—I should have found it a very hard doctrine in the conditions of India to-day.

432. What you mean, I presume, is that a very few women would exercise the vote?—I would go a little further than that, I think: very few women would come to the polling booth to exercise the vote. The exercise of the vote by the vast majority of women who would be enfranchised would present extraordinary difficulties, practically and socially.

433. Supposing Lord Southborough had used the word "person" wherever he had used the word "male," or words to that effect—the same qualification for men and women—would it have enfranchised a great number of women?—I have not got the figures, but I should think a very considerable number.

434. A very considerbale number pay income tax or land revenue?—A very considerable number.

435. I forgot to ask you one question about the financial arrangements. I am awfully sorry to jump about like this, but I might go back to that question. If a Governor acted with discretion and courage there would be no difference between a resolution which was advisory on a reserved subject and a resolution which was binding, unless the Governor reversed it?—Very little practical difference.

436. Have not you, therefore, in recommending one course rather than the other, underestimated the steadying effect of the Statutory Commission proposal?—I do

—I do not think so. Our difficulty has been—I am sorry to repeat the same line of argument so often—simply this, that at the outset of these new arrangements, probably for the duration of the first two Councils, that is to say for the first six years, we anticipate a period of considerable strain, difficulty, and possibly misunderstanding. After that we certainly anticipate smoother water, and probably by the time that the Statutory Commission comes along it will find a much better spirit than we fear is possible at present in operation in nearly all the provinces. We are most desperately anxious to carry things through the first five or six difficult years with a minimum of friction and difficulty. That, I think, puts our position as clearly as I can put it.

437. Yes, but, Sir James, supposing this Bill passes, the only possible method by which Indians can obtain more power in the provinces is through the Statutory Commission?—Yes.

438. If, therefore, they behave unreasonably even in the first year, in the excitement of the first year, they know that it will be quoted against them when the Statutory Commission arrives. That is the sort of evidence upon which the Statutory Commission will come to its conclusion. Is not that so?—I hope the Statutory Commission will be in a position to forget and forgive by the time it starts work.

439. Do you think anybody will let it?—Oh yes.

440. I am putting now a pure hypothesis; I am not expressing any opinion; but supposing this Committee were to decide against you on that subject, and supposing the scheme was that all Budget resolutions were to be binding unless those on the reserved subjects were restored by the Government, is there any logical reason why the same system, mutatis mutandis, should not be applied to the Government of India itself? I mean, of course, there would be no transferred subjects there on the hypothesis, but is there any reason for not allowing the Budget to be debated in the Legislative Assembly with power to the Government to restore any item it wishes?—This is a proposition outside the report, as I understand.

441. Well, it is one of the amendments which has been suggested in India to the Bill, and it is included in your Blue Book as coming, I think, from numerous public bodies?—Yes.

442. You have not made that recommendation, I admit?—No.

443. And you probably did not make that recommendation, because you objected to that system even in the provinces. I am only putting the hypothesis. Supposing you were beaten, if I may use the word, on the Provinces, is there any logical reason why the same thing should not apply to the Government of India?—That is to say, is there any reason why the proposals for the expenditure of the central revenues should not be submitted to resolutions of (a) the Central Assembly, and (b) the Council of State, and that those resolutions, if accepted by both those Houses, should not be binding on the Government of India save in so far as the Governor-General refused to accept them?

444. Yes?—I accept that proposition.

445. You accept that proposition?—Yes.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

446. You were Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces?—Yes.

447. Do you think that under the scheme of the Bill you could have administered the United Provinces as Governor without undue difficulty as regards the functions of the Governor himself?—I think so.

448. With regard to the Governor's relations to the Executive Councils, would you explain the extent to which they are changed as compared with what they are now? What is his status as regards the Executive Council?—I will endeavour to answer your question, but I may explain that I have no personal acquaintance with the matter. I have never been a Governor with an Executive Council. My Province was a single-handed one.

449. No, but take your general knowledge?—My answer would be that little or no difference is proposed in the relations of the Governor with the Executive Council from those that subsist at present, mainly because the legal position remains unaffected. Section 50 of the present Act is not, I think, at all altered, or at any rate not materially altered by the Bill now before you.

450. With regard to the Government of Bengal, on page 202 of the letter of the Government of India of the 5th March, the functions of the Governor are drawn up. Under them, as I understand, although he is a member of the Executive Council, he can override the Council. Then if his Ministers and Executive Council differ on overlapping subjects, he has to decide between them; he has to decide disputes as to whether a question falls within the reserved or transferred category. Then taking his relation to the Legislative Council, he has to certify Bills for Grand Committee; he has to certify if a clause of a Bill dealing with a transferred subject infringes on a reserved subject; he can dissolve his Council; he can refuse assent to a Bill and he can certify as to the necessary financial provision for reserved subjects; he can dismiss his Ministers and veto legislation?—Yes.

451. Is there any precedent for the presiding officer of an elective Council like a legislative Council having the power to override their decisions as well as the power, when he is sitting with a Council which is not elected, to override them? Had the Government, in assenting to that, any precedent in their minds for such action?—The power of veto over a legislative Council exists at present. The power of overriding the Executive Council also exists at present under the conditions defined in Section 50. The power of dismissing Ministers, we understood, exists in Dominion constitutions, so that, although the complex of all those powers may not at present exist anywhere, inasmuch as the Indian conditions do not exist anywhere else, we thought we had grounds for each individual power.

452. The President of a popularly-elected assembly has got to keep order, has he not?—Yes.

453. Do you think the function of keeping order, for which he should possess the confidence of every member of the Assembly, can, at the same time, be properly exercised with the function of overruling the Assembly?—In the sense of vetoing Legislation?

454. In the sense of vetoing Legislation, or even of deciding that, as between them and another body, the business belongs to another body, and not to them?—That second power does not affect the Legislative Council as much as the Ministers—the Ministers vis-à-vis the Executive Council. I should put it in this way, that his power of over-riding the Legislature is restricted to his power of refusing to accept resolutions, and his power of vetoing Legislation. Although I admit the anomaly of having a President, the Speaker, so to speak, placed in that position, we had to accept it as a transitory measure. We believe that in time the Legislature will have its own elected President; but during the preliminary stages we feel that the advice and guidance of the Governor, who probably may be the only man in the room with Parliamentary experience, will be invaluable.

455. Would it not be probably preferable to appoint another man with Parliamentary experience to guide the Assembly and leave the Governor free and untrammelled as a deciding factor?—Yes; I should see no objection to that

456. Do not you think, speaking generally, that the massing of all these, as you yourself, I think, admitted, anomalous functions in one man is excessive?—It places a very heavy burden upon the Governor of the future.

457. And especially, I assume, on a Governor who has only just come from England. Would you agree with what is said by the Government of Bombay on page 193, para. 15: "The majority of these duties are imposed upon the Governor owing to the suggested division of the two spheres of Government, and in the opinion of this Government the burden, in practice, will be intolerable." Would you go as far as that?—Not quite so far.

458. Would you go so far as the Government of Madras on page 161, para. 10: "It appears to be a grave defect in the scheme that such a hiatus should be liable regularly to recur." "There must be a period at the commencement of each Governor's term of office when these responsibilities will be in excess of his powers, owing to his lack of acquaintance with the

the country, people and officials"?—It was mainly for that reason that we suggested strengthening his hands by the appointment in those circumstances of a second official colleague. We all admit the gravity of the burden that falls upon the Governor, and many of the Government of India's proposals have been directed to trying to lighten that burden.

459. Well, if they were lightened further you would not be distressed. I should like to ask you one question about the Grand Committee. The Grand Committee is to contain fourteen out of forty who would be nominees of the Government or certain supporters of the Government?—I think fourteen would definitely be officials. That is about the ratio.

460. At all events, the parties would be very evenly matched in the Grand Committee. The decision might go either way, might it not?—For or against the Government measure?

461. Yes?—Oh, yes. It is very even.

462. Considering the way Grand Committee has had to be made up, do you think that their decision would be taken as a final one?—Well, by law it would be final.

463. But I mean would it be accepted? You are taking it is an alternative to a decision by a popularly elected body. Do you think that their decision would be accepted?—It would not carry the same popular assent as a decision by the full Council.

464. Do you think it would carry more popular assent if the Governor himself had to decide the matter?—That would be a system of ordinance or regulations, I take it.

465. It has been the custom in India from time immemorial to have decisions of one man. This Grand Committee would not be an actual popular body? Do you think it would carry more weight than the decision of one man who was really an impartial judge, so to speak?—I think so, because even in the Grand Committee, constituted as it is, you have representation of all the different interests concerned; you have free discussion; you have publicity, which would not attach to the decree of an individual Governor.

466. I should like to ask you one question about the time of reconsidering this Bill. If once the question is settled and you fix such a period as ten years, do not you think that an agitation to change the decisions arrived at may begin very soon? Do you think that ten years is a sufficiently long period? The object is to get everybody to set to work, not to consider the machinery, but to do the work. Do not you think that if there is a prospect in ten years of the machinery being overhauled again too much time and attention may be devoted to that?—What we felt was that ten years would come in the life-time of the fourth Legislative Council under the new scheme, and that possibly the agitation of the character you describe would be visible in the early years, in the first Council or probably even the second, but that after that people would settle down to work, settle down possibly to greater harmony. On the whole, we should be indisposed to shorten the period of ten years We should be sorry to see any shorter period.

467. Would you object if it were made fifteen years?—I think it would cause disappointment in India if it were made fifteen years. I think ten to twelve years is the period which Indian sentiment would welcome.

468. Your object in fixing the period would be as largely as possible to get people of all classes to centre on the work to be done rather than on the change of machinery for doing it?—Quite so.

Sir Henry Craik.

469. I think the Government of India took part in the earliest negotiations leading up to this Bill, and assented to it? They took part in the earliest deliberations, and assented to the views that were expressed in the report?—The Government of India have been at work on this question in a very acute and active form since 1916, and they certainly were participants in all the earlier discussions.

470. That is what I mean—you were participants in the earlier discussions, and you accepted the views generally embodied in the Montagu-Chelmsford report?—Yes.

471. You then assented to the dualism principle of the Diarchy, and you still continue to support that view?—We do.

472. But I think you recognise that the dual system at least is novel and untried?—We do.

473. And you say that although you have spent more than a year now in trying to elaborate the details you are still far from being satisfied that they are fully arranged?—That is of the scheme as a whole?

474. Yes; does not it come to what I say, that although you have been working at the details for a year you still feel that a long time must elapse before you can settle?—It is a revolution.

475. Let me ask you first with regard to one of the answers you gave, I think, to Sir J. D. Rees: I think you assented to the fact that at present India was a case of duality—that there was duality from top to bottom, vertical duality right through. He put that question, to which you answered, "Unquestionably"?—That, I think, was the purport of it—yes.

476. Surely, the analogy between the duality, that there is in the sense of the Government of India having certain functions and the provincial Governments having others, is a very different sort of duality from that which is now proposed?—Oh, entirely different.

477. There is no analogy between the two?—The dualism between the central and provincial functions is a dualism subject to one uniform control.

478. A dualism where people may take different views of particular administrative measures, and may form a judgment slightly different, but where they are both responsible to Parliament, whereas the dualism which is embodied in this report, and which you support, is, in the words of the dispatch, a division between two authorities, one the Imperial Parliament, the other an Indian electorate?—Yes.

479. Therefore there is no analogy really between the two dualisms, what may be called the existing dualism, and what is now coming forward?—My answer had reference rather to the implied suggestion that the Indian citizen is unaccustomed to deal with two sets of civic authorities. Under the division between central and provincial powers that, of course, is not so.

480. You admit that this system, with its many advantages, which we all admit is novel and untried: You look with favour upon it very largely because you think that it will form a most successful educative process towards responsible political government?—That is one reason; there are other reasons.

481. I say you do so largely; I used the word "largely" because of that?—Yes; I accept that.

482. In watching the development of political responsibility and freedom, can you point to any precedent for such a course of education? Do you think that it will be the best means of developing political responsibility that you should assign personal responsibility for certain functions to some Ministers, and deprive them of anything but merely advisory functions with regard to others? Has not political responsibility been developed in all our history by joint responsibility, gradually developing itself?—As a general proposition, I should say that political responsibility has been the result, in most countries with which I am familiar, of joint action between two parties in the State. Of those two parties, one or other might be in power alternatively, and each has the capacity for influencing the situation and developing the growth of political institutions; but in an Indian Province the conditions are so entirely different, in so far as your official Government must remain in effective power while the other, or popular, Government is learning its work. That is, to me, what differentiates our scheme from any historical analogy that I have yet seen.

483. I did not mean to refer to the analogy of divided Parties, but rather to the fact that men learn the real functions of government by being associated with others who take a joint part with them in the Government, and that it is not by being relegated to a particular subject, and told that there you may exercise your personal freedom and responsibility, that they develop a sense of joint responsibility?—May I put a consideration which I think is relevant to your question. The Government of India took its stand on the provision in the Bill, Clause 28, which prescribes, ten years hence, the appointment of a Parliamentary Committee to examine the work of the system of Government, and to decide to what extent it is desirable to extend or modify the degree of responsible government then existing; and they felt that it would be an impossible task for this Commission, or any other form of inquiry, to come to a decision on these all-important matters unless they had before them material which can only be provided by demarcating the responsibility of those who are going to take upon themselves, by increasing degrees the task of responsible government. If they had to examine the records of a composite Government with joint responsibility they would find it almost impossible to ascertain at first hand, and in a manner that would satisfy their own judgment, the part which had been played by the representatives of the people as opposed to their official colleagues, more particularly if there were, as there probably would be, a frequent interchange of portfolios.

484. Without offering any opinion, I recognise the points to which you attach value. You think you will develop responsible government by a demarcation of functions, assigning particular functions to certain Ministers responsible to the Legislative Councils, retaining other functions in the hands of those responsible to the British Parliament, and that at the end of certain periods of years an outside authority will come in and say: "Now we will form a judgment as to how far this is successful, and what further extensions we should have." You see there is another course—I only put it; I do not pronounce upon it—of saying: "We will give you as far as possible, we will extend to the Indian population as far as possible, a joint share at once of authority and of responsibility, and we will allow that to grow of itself, and to develop itself as it has in every other country which has claimed free government," without being reviewed at decennial periods by an outside authority—you recognise that?—Yes, I recognise that as the alternative.

485. I have studied your despatch very carefully. You had before you two plans for demarcation which the Government of India calls in their despatch the vertical and the horizontal division?—Yes.

486. A very good name. Now the vertical division is that which is adopted in the Diarchy?—Yes.

487. And you set aside the horizontal division which would develop and educate political responsibility by assigning a large and responsible share in subordinate functions and gradually extending these subordinate functions?—Yes.

488. But with no demarcation?—We set that aside, yes.

489. You did not think that that was good?—We thought that it failed in various respects.

490. But you admit that your plan—I think you answered my friend Lord Midleton just now—does present the very serious anomaly that you have to correct it by calling in a very very strong exercise of individual authority on the part of the Governor, for which you could point to no parallel in any of our self-governing colonies or even the Crown colonies?—I should think the position in a Crown colony was at least as autocratic as the position of a Governor under our scheme.

491. Not in the way of establishing the semblance of a very popular representation, and yet giving power to knock that over?—I am not sure that in the earlier history of our Dominions the Governor was not endowed with very full powers to guide and correct his Ministers.

492. Yes, but they were not given a camouflaged system of independence which was to be knocked over. Now I am going to ask a few questions about revenue. You prefer a separate purse?—Yes.

493. In that you differ from the Report and the recommendations?—Yes.

494. You say that taxation is also to be separate?—Taxation and borrowing, yes.

495. But I observe in some of your answers that you are not to carry out the system of demarcation in regard to taxation, because you contemplated in one answer that you gave that the Ministers, the persons responsible to the Legislative Council, might propose a new land assessment for primary education, although land matters, of course, would be one of the reserved subjects?—Yes; I said so.

496. Would not any such tax very seriously interfere with the reserved subjects of land administration?—The land administration would collect the tax.

497. Which it might not approve of?—It probably would not like it.

498. And it might find the land administration very seriously affected by that tax?—The principle of levying cesses on land in addition to the ordinary land revenue is quite familiar in India. I do not think it would present any serious difficulty.

499. That is only one instance. Is it possible, with the power of taxation and proposing new taxes which you give, that one Minister might propose a tax interfering very seriously with the administration of a Department which was under the authority of another Minister?—I doubt if it would interfere more seriously than, for example, the well-known centimes additionels in France levied by local authorities for local purposes.

500. With regard to the revenue, do you say that each section should also be responsible for the collection of its own tax?—If a tax levied at the instance of one half of the Government happened to fall within the administrative field of the other half it would be the latter which would collect and hand over the proceeds to the section of the Government which was in need of the money.

501. Would there be one common tax-gathering authority, or would there be a number of different divided and demarcated tax-gathering authorities?—No; I do not think so. The same authority would collect as at present. I am afraid we sometimes picture this scheme as if it were going to upset the whole of what is really the kernel of Indian administration; the ordinary district officer's work.

502. That is quite true; but is it not possible to imagine that now that you are upsetting all this past administration you must now face a future which will be rather different, and where you will have to be guided by broad principles which you must lay down; the old habits which you have been accustomed to may give way and you may not find them the same safeguard that they were before? You are establishing a new system, and you must have broad new principles upon which it is to rest. You must either have one system of tax-gathering or you must have demarcation?—Our system is very much demarcated at present.

503. And you propose that that will continue. It would be a very dangerous thing. Let me take one other aspect of this finance. I want you to turn to para. 74 of the despatch of March 5th. You say, with regard to the Finance Department: "We are convinced that the Department in each province must be one and undivided"?—That is so.

504. Is that consistent with separate purses?—Perfectly.

505. But surely financial control must really affect enormously—it must dominate the separate purses, and according to this paragraph you make the Finance Minister absolutely dominant?—I hope not; that certainly was not the intention. The Finance Minister will certainly be in a position to advise and to warn his non-official colleagues about acts of theirs in their financial administration.

506. If there is a difference between his colleagues and himself, then he must bring it to one authority, and that authority will presumably follow the advice of the Finance Minister, and that authority will surely override all differences between sectional Ministers?—I do not look at it in that way at all. Financial administration is the handmaid of the Executive administration, and in so far as the Executive on either side requires the help of the financial experts it will have it, but it will be in a very much stronger position if those are experts with an outlook upon the whole field of Provincial administration. But the idea that the Financial Department will in some way be able to overrule or override Ministers is a complete fallacy which we have endeavoured to destroy in the course of this despatch.

507. Do you not think that finance must not be the handmaid, but rather to a very great extent the dominant influence in all this?—It is a very powerful influence, but I should never allow it to completely override Executive considerations.

508. The first allotment has been made under section 1 (1) (d), and then there are to be separate purses, and it is to be stereotyped for a certain number of years, and to be subject to review at the end of that period?—That is the suggestion.

509. During the intervening time, within the limits set for it by the purse assigned to him, the Minister does not need to consult his colleagues. There is no give and take. He knows what his money is?—Yes, he is master within his own house.

510. Do you think that finance, which must dominate administration so largely, should remain stereotyped for a considerable period of years? We must turn to our own country and our own experience: How would any administrative office in this country do if it were told, "You must go on with a fixed Budget for a certain number of years"? Would it be possible to develop its administration?—This is not a fixed Budget, this is a Budget which will grow with the development of their own resources. There is no fixity about it.

511. We may hope it will grow, but it is not necessarily so. It is not adjusted according to its own needs. The growth of their resources is one which may come with prosperity and with an increase in the product of certain taxes, but it is not one which grows by being shaped by the estimates which are submitted from year to year according to the needs of the Department?—I take it the resources of the two halves of the Government will grow if their policy is wise and progressive, just in the same way as the resources of the Provincial Governments as a whole grow at present.

512. Surely there might be a great misfortune which might make the particular taxes yield less than at present?—Take the case of a famine, which will immediately react very seriously upon the reserved departments, much more seriously upon them than upon the transferred departments. It will then be for the reserved departments to take the necessary measures of economy to meet this difficulty, and, should the worst come to the worst, possibly to borrow or even ultimately to impose taxation.

513. Would you not do what is ordinarily done in a free nation with a popular assembly, which imposes taxes to the measure of its needs, and raises the taxes as required each year?—That would be done under our scheme. That would be practicable under our scheme.

514. You think that the divided purse might be adjusted by give and take—that there would not be very serious friction?—The give and take to which reference was made in my answer earlier this morning dealt with the surplus funds at the disposal of the two halves of the Government.

515. But I think you did say in answer to Mr. Montagu that you thought good sense and forbearance and mutual feeling would save you from a great amount of the friction that might possibly be feared from separate purses?—No, I think my position is a little different from that. What I have been trying to establish is that the separate purses will allow operations to begin, and will prepare the way for the good sense and forbearance that may ultimately make it possible to come back to a joint purse That is my suggestion.

516. You do not think that if you were to draw a larger amount of Indian responsibility into the Government without demarcation of functions, forbearance and developing responsibility and the lessons of common action would yield results as good in administration?—The position of the Government of India is that what you say would be true if both the official half and the non-official half of the Executive Government derived their authority from the same source, but inasmuch as they derive their authoities and instruction, their ideals and standards, from different sources, we fear friction and difficulties which would destroy the whole structure of the composite Government such as you suggest.

Sir J. D. Rees.] On a point of order: Sir James Meston's evidence is very important and covers a wide field. Will those of us who have examined him earlier be allowed to ask him some brief argumentative questions aring out of his evidence at the close of his examination?

Chairman.] That rather depends on the time at our disposal.

Duke of Northumberland.

517. I have only one question. Can you tell me whether you think it is absolutely necessary to have one uniform system of legislation for the whole of India, or whether, in view of the great differences which exist between Provinces, some of them more advanced than others, and also in view of the fact that there is a difference of fundamental principles between the Governments of Provinces regarding this point, it would not be possible to set up a slightly different constitution for the different Provinces of India?—I do not think the Government of India would have any objection to an experimental variation of that sort.

Lord Sydenham.

518. I think when you were Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces in 1917 you put forward a scheme for constitutional reform?—Yes; I submitted a proposal, like all other heads of Provinces.

519. And those proposals differed considerably from the scheme which is in the present Bill?—Oh, yes.

520. Quite considerably?—Yes.

521. Before the conference at Delhi last January, had the Provincial Governments any opportunity of proposing alternative schemes? — Yes; they were called into conference in January, 1918.

522. And asked to put forward alternative schemes? —They were asked to assist the Secretary of State and the Viceroy in arriving at a scheme which would be generally acceptable.

523. Do not you think that the present scheme, as it stands, has been coldly received by the Indian educated classes?—No; I should not say that. I think it has met with a very gratifying acceptance.

524. Are there any non-officials, British or Indian, who accept the scheme whole-heartedly, as it stands? —There are; yes.

525. May it not be said that it has somewhat alarmed both the public services and the non-official classes, British and Indian?—The public services, to take them first, are naturally nervous about a change which so materially affects not only their position, but their duties and responsibilities in the past. Everyone who knows the public services believes that they will loyally do their utmost to cooperate and make a success of whatever scheme Parliament decides upon. As regards the non-official Indian and British residents in India, the diversity of opinion is so enormous that it would be difficult for me to bring it into one formula. We have attempted to summarise it very briefly in the beginning of the first despatch.

526. In one of your replies to Mr. Bennett you spoke of the interest in politics reaching new strata of Indian society. Is not that in some measure due to the alarm of Mohammedans and lower caste Hindoos at the future possibilities before them, and their wish to have safeguards—in some measure, I said, not entirely?—That desire for safeguards has been certainly manifest within the last year since it became apparent that a form of responsible Government was imminent. But the point that I tried to make, in answer to Mr. Bennett, was rather that what, for want of a better term, I will describe as the spirit of nationalism, is generally permeating classes who were indifferent in years gone by.

527. I think you said the Government of India had considered all criticisms of this scheme. Has that consideration included the addresses sent from non-Brahmin bodies to Mr. Montagu, in 1917?—Oh, yes; they were very carefully considered.

528. Do you think this Committee ought to see those representations?—That is not for me to say, I think.

529. Of course, you understand that these people are mostly very poor, and that they would send deputations to this country if they had money?—I presume they would; yes.

530. But we are only likely to hear from the Non-Brahmin Association of Southern India and, I think, from the Madras landholders, because they are the only people who have been able to raise sufficient money?——

Mr. Montagu.

531. Did you assent to that statement of Lord Sydenham?—I am not familiar with the matter. I understood it was a statement of fact.

532. I thought it was a question?—No; I did not understand it so.

Lord Sydenham.] I think that is the fact, is it not, Mr. Montagu?

Mr. Montagu.] I do not know. I thought you were putting it to the witness, and I wondered whether he knew.

Lord Sydenham.] The Non-Brahmin Association of Southern India has sent a deputation? I think you told us so?

Mr. Montagu.] No, I did not. I do not know of any deputation, officially.

Lord Sydenham.] I think you will find it is mentioned in what you said the other day.

Mr. Montagu.] I said I was given to understand so. I do not want to enter into controversy. All I meant was that it ought to be clear whether the statement is a statement or a question, and, if it is a question, whether silence assents to it. I understood Lord Sydenham to ask Sir James Meston whether it was not true that the only non-Brahmins who could come to this country, owing to the question of funds, were the non-Brahmins of Southern India.

Witness.] I could not answer that question.

Lord Sydenham.

533. Apart from constitutional theory, speaking simply as an experienced administrator, do not you think that the scheme put forward by the five heads of Provinces is rather more in keeping with Indian traditions and sentiment, and more likely to work smoothly, than the scheme embodied in the Bill?—I certainly do not think it is more likely to work smoothly. I feel it is likely to produce a very much more acute and dangerous form of confusion and conflict.

534. Do you think that the complications of this dual Government—which are very difficult for us to understand—are likely to be understood or mastered by the people in India?—I do not think any constitutional change will, at the outset be understood by the masses of the people. We have to teach them.

535. You remember paragraphs 47 and 48 of the Government of India's letter, dealing with the Indian Civil Service, and you remember that that proposes that, in case of disagreement with a popular Minister, a Civil Servant should ask to be allowed to retire upon a proportionate pension?—That is proposed; yes.

536. Do you really, personally, think that that is fair to men without private means, men who, having spent a great part of their lives in India, would not be able to make a change?—That depends very much on the generosity with which the pensions are determined.

537. But a proportionate pension on years might press very hardly on a man who had some years to serve?—I quite agree; yes.

538. You realise also that if a popular Minister having a dispute with a Civil Servant is proved to be wrong, and if the popular Minister's decision is reversed, the Civil Servant who was right still has to go?—He would be in a very difficult position if he stayed.

539. Is not that rather a serious matter as tending to get rid of some of the most exeperienced and conscientious members of the Civil Service in India?—The matter, of course, is a very serious one in its effect upon the public services; but there are bigger considerations even than that.

540. And the bigger considerations aught to override, I suppose. Now, will the Government of India make similar provision for all the other services which are similarly affected by the Bill?—The Government of India have proposed to put the whole of the all-India services on a similar footing.

541. As regards proportionate pensions?—I think as regards practically every suggestion they make here.

542. In your statement to the Chairman you said, very frankly, that it was a rooted belief in some quarters that the execeptional powers of the Governor, the power to restore abbreviated estimates and the power to certify Legislation in Grand Committees, will rarely be exercised, because of the pressure of popular opinion and the effect of agitation. Now, does not that rather point to Government by intimidation?—It points to the necessity for a strong and experienced Governor.

543. A Governor who will not be intimidated by political pressure?—Undoubtedly.

544. Is there at the present time any public opinion in India in the sense in which we use the words here, considering that 94 per cent. of the people are not yet educated?—It is very rapidly growing.

545. I think you said, in reply to Lord Islington, that the divided purse system was advocated by the Government of India for one reason, that it made it easier to estimate the revenue in advance. I do not know whether I misunderstood you. Could you make that point clear?—My point was that the divided purse enables each half of the Government to estimate with confidence in advance what are going to be its own resources in the future.

546. Is not it the practice in this country, and everywhere else, to estimate the national resources as a whole?—It simply means a combination of the estimate of the two halves; but the point I have been trying to make is that under the joint purse system neither half of the Government will know from year to year what is going to be the division of resources in future. That will depend entirely upon what you might call the "pull-devil-pull-baker" attitude of the two halves of the Government at each Budget period, whereas under the system that we have been trying to urge, the growth of each half of the revenues will be a definite calculable figure within certain obvious limitations.

547. You did not mean to convey the impression which I derived that it was easier to estimate on a divided basis than to estimate the revenue as a whole?—Oh, no; I should be very sorry if I were understood as meaning that.

548. Then my impression was wrong. I think you said in reply to Sir John Rees, that the divided revenue system must emphasise the duality of the Government. Is that your view?—It is a very natural consequence of the duality of the Cabinet.

Sir J. D. Rees.

549. I said the divided purse?—It is a very important attribute of the duality of the Cabinet.

Lord Sydenham.

550. May I take it, from your reply to Lord Islington, that you referred to the divided purse as an essential part of the dual system?—The Government of India have hardly gone so far as that. They say that the divided purse is a feature of the dual system which they regard as of the very highest importance.

551. You would not go so far as to say that you would rather abandon the dual system than give up the dual purse?—No; I have no instructions to say that.

552. Now, I do not think you made it quite clear what would happen if one purse is overflowing and the other is depleted?—I am afraid I must answer this at some length, because I have to begin at the beginning, so to speak. When the purses are divided, the first step is to take the Provincial balances at the present moment. The Provincial balance is a very considerable sum, which is now standing to the credit of each Province with the Government of India; it runs into crores of rupees. Some part is earmarked for specific purposes; some part we shall have to earmark as a famine insurance fund; but after that there will be a considerable amount of free money banked with the Government of India at the credit of each Provincial Government. If the separate purse is instituted, a division will be made first of all of that balance. Supposing we take hypothetical figures: If a Province happens to have a balance of three crores of rupees at its credit, it is quite possible that one crore will be placed at the credit of the official half of the Government, and two crores at the credit of the reserved, or vice versa. Anyhow, a substantial opening balance, as we call it, will be at the disposal of each half of the Government. Each half of the Government will then be placed in possession of the proceeds of its own revenue departments, and there will be any subsidiary adjustment that may be necessary to ensure that those proceeds are sufficient for the normal expenditure requirements of the departments concerned. Before either purse can be exhausted it must have spent, not only the whole of the revenue which has been allocated to it, but also the whole of the balances standing at its credit. When that time comes, my suggestion is that the part of the Government concerned will have so far exhausted its finance that it is time for it to look about to find new sources of revenue—in other words, to impose new taxation.

553. I think you admit it would not do to take the surplus from the transferred purse to make up any deficiency in the reserved purse, because that would probably give rise to a considerable wrangle?—I should not suggest that.

554. And also it would be very difficult to impose taxation solely for the purpose of filling up one of the purses?—That may have to be done. I may also mention one quite subsidiary and purely technical argument that balances in the sense that I have been trying to describe them are really available for non-recurring expenditure, whereas if one-half of the Government has committed itself to a policy which requires larger recurring expenditure than corresponds with its revenue, it would naturally impose taxation; it could not with any prudence depend entirely upon its balances.

555. Do you think that a surplus in the transformed purse might create a danger of rather rash financial schemes?—That is why we have this strong Central Finance Department to help to advise them against rashness.

556. I understood you said that the transferred Budget was exempt from contributions to the Central Government?—I said that as a matter of convenience we proposed to cast the contributions upon the reserved Budget.

557. Does not that mean isolation from the liability to contribute to the needs of India as a whole on the part of one section of the Cabinet?—The necessities of each section of the Cabinet will be determined after the elimination of the contribution; in other words, let me put it in this way, that the first charge upon the available resources of the Province as a whole will be the contribution to the Government of India; a second charge will probably be the service of loans already existing or in future to be created. Then what remains will be distributed between the two purses, so that I think it is somewhat of a straining of language to speak of either one or the other as being subjected to the burden of contribution.

558. It would not be correct to assume that the transferred Budget is relieved from any liability for the needs of the Government of India as a whole?—I think that is an imperfect statement of the case.

559. Now do you realise that you are really conferring upon Ministers, who for a time may be inexperienced, powers which no Minister in this country at present can use?—I find it very difficult to answer that question through want of experience of this country.

560. I have some experience of both, and that is my view, which may be quite wrong, but you would rather not answer that?—I have not really the knowledge to answer that.

561. Do not you think that one result might be to create an Indian bureaucracy with very large powers?—I think at the outset your Ministers will be drawn from a very narrow circle, and will probably represent interests which you may not regard as universal. The only corrective for that is to get the business going and start it, and let the interests who consider themselves neglected get into the habit of political action, and get into the habit of having themselves duly represented both in the Council and in the Ministry.

562. I think you admit that under popular Ministers Indian bureaucracies might be made up in time, and that they might have more power than bureaucracies administered by the other side of the Cabinet?—I hope that that tendency will break down.

563. Do you not think the Government of India tends to under-estimate the effect of the enormous changes produced by the large elected majorities of the Provincial Councils, combined with the very great increase of the powers and functions of those Councils?—I do not think it under-estimates them, but it finds a great difficulty in seeing any line of advance so long as you maintain the present constitution of the Councils. It is tremendously impressed by the growing and natural resentment against the constant use in many Provinces of the official bloc in the Councils.

564. Of course, the official bloc would go?—I beg your pardon. I thought you were referring to the advantages of the present councils.

565. No. I was speaking of the system which would prevail with a large elected majority and with the enormous increase in the powers conferred upon the councils. Is it not fair to say that that alone must place at once a heavy and direct responsibility on elected members, and, through the elected members, upon the electorate of India?—That is the whole purpose of the scheme.

566. That alone, without your dual system and your Diarchy—that is my point?—I am afraid I do not quite catch the question.

567. My point is this: You are going to give large elected majorities in every Provincial Council in India?—Yes.

568. You are going, at the same time, to give those councils very much increased powers, powers which they never dreamed of possessing before. Would not that alone give direct and heavy responsibility to the elected members, and therefore to the electorates?—Yes; but not to the members of the Executive. We want to get the leaders of the people brought into the Executive to a much larger extent than is possible at present.

569. The responsibility you are thinking of is the responsibility of Ministers, and not the responsibility of Parliament?—We have been thinking of both, really. There are two, if not three, classes of responsibility.

570. But much more the responsibility of Ministers?—I am thinking of that primarily in dealing with Diarchy, yes.

571. Now, with regard to what Sir John Rees called vertical duality, which is said to exist already in India, does not that exist in every Federal system in the world?—Quite so.

572. I think you told Sir Henry Craik that there was not the slightest analogy between that and duality in a Cabinet?—Yes.

573. Is not unity the fundamental principle upon which the Cabinet system in all countries absolutely depends?—I quite agree.

574. As dual cabinets are quite unknown throughout the civilised world, and, as you say, they are novel and untried, must not all ideas of what will result from them in India be pure conjecture?—Very largely conjectural at present.

575. I think you have seen the Government of India proposal for Grand Committees, which are to provide a majority of one in every Province?—Yes.

576. And I think the Government of India said that this was necessary in order that the will of the Government should prevail in the Grand Committee?—In order that the official half of the Government might be able to carry legislation, which they regarded as essential.

577. Considering that people suffer a good deal from temporary casualities in India, do you think a majority of one is likely to be effective?—Casualties may happen on both sides.

578. That is true; but if any very burning question was to be settled by the final vote in the Grand Committee, might not some temporary casualties be rather likely to occur?—That is, of course, a possible contingency, yes.

579. Now, supposing the Grand Committee sits quite intact for its final decision, would not any debate in that case be a hollow sham, because the division could be forejudged?—The majority of nominated members is not wholly official. You have both in the proposals of the Report and even in the modified proposals of the Government of India a substantial majority of non-officials.

580. But the whole principle of the Grand Committee is in order to enable the Government to carry a Bill which it cannot carry in the Legislative Assembly?—That is the point, yes.

581. As the result of a division presumably on that principle must be a foregone conclusion, might not the members of the Grand Committee very well decline to debate at all?—That is possible, yes.

582. And would not it really be better, if the Government cannot by persuasion and argument in the Legislative Council get its Bill passed, and if the Bill has no outside support whatever, for the Government to abandon its Bill than to go into the Grand Committee?—The difficulty to our minds was that the Executive may at any time be faced with the necessity of passing a Bill in the interests of the peace of the Province, which is admittedly repugnant to the popular interests in the Assembly, and if it is going to be deprived of that power, it seems to me that it loses its validity as an instrument of government.

583. Are not the powers for the preservation of order sufficient as they now stand—those powers which reside with Provincial Governments and the powers of the supreme Government on the top?—It is only a few months ago that we had to pass a very exceptional measure.

584. Most true, but that puts the thing on as firm a basis as it was before?—Yes, but it does not provide for all future contingencies. The present law is very powerful and effective, but it is also to be remembered that the new Councils may find it part of what they believe to be their duty to attempt to modify the present law.

585. That would be another thing; that would not be a Government trying to pass its Bill and failing to do it in the Council. That would be the popular Minister trying to pass a Bill to which the Government objected. That would be different?—I quite accept that.

586. Do you not really think that these checks and artifices, which are transparently obvious, must cause offence to a great many sober-minded Indians?—It is really a question of the balance of advantages, whether we are going to start this new system on a basis which we believe to be a safe one, or whether we are going to embark upon something which is absolutely unknown and untried without the safeguards which ordinary administrative exprience and prudence have suggested.

587. In reference to your answer to Mr. Montagu, did the Government of India accept the all-Indian Moslem League as really representative of the Mohammedans of India as a whole?—They have not contested the presentation of the case.

588. Then they regarded the all-Indian Moslem League as competent to form the compact which was arrived at at Lucknow?—They accepted the fait accompli.

589. I think you said in reply to Lord Midleton that you regarded the position of a Governor of a Province as practically unchanged by the Bill?—Vis-à-vis his Executive Council. That was the question.

590. You said you had had no experience as the Head of a Council Government?—Yes.

591. Do you think that there is anyone in India who has had that experience who will agree with your view?—My statement was simply that the position of the Governor vis-à-vis his Executive Council is the same under the Bill as it is under the existing law. I did not go further than that. I admitted that the burden upon him would be greater, his responsibilities and anxieties would be greater, and all that. My answer was explicitly directed to the position under Section 50.

592. That his position would be unchanged?—Vis a-vis his Executive Council.

593. But his general position vis-a-vis his popular Ministers and his divided Cabinet must be very much changed?—It is entirely new.

Sir J. D. Rees.

594. Arising out of your evidence I gather you hold that substantially the position of the Government of India and its powers with regard to provincial Governments are not altogether changed; in the chief features they remain?—The powers of the Government of India in relation to provincial Governments remain as at present under Section 45 of the law. There is a proposal that a considerable measure of devolution or decentralisation should be undertaken.

595. They do retain the concurrent power to a great extent of overriding legislation?—In respect of reserved subjects they certainly do.

596. Can it be said that when responsibility is conceded to a provincial Government in part none is given to the Government of India? Can you divide them off like that? Does not the concession of responsibility to a provincial Government really imply a concession of responsibility all round? Is not the position of the Government of India altered by reason of the concession of that responsibility?—May I make it clear what I have been asked to answer? I have been asked to say that inasmuch as provincial Governments are now being given a larger measure of responsibility, the capacity for control on the part of the Government of India must be, pro tanto, weakened?

597. Yes?—Yes, I accept that.

598. You spoke about the women's vote. You said they would not come to vote if they had the vote. Do you base that upon the well-known and admirable qualities of Indian women, their deference to their husbands' opinions, so that they would not care to vote otherwise—upon their well-known modesty—or do you base that upon a feeling that it is a purdah proposition?—I think it would be very repugnant to the feelings of respectable ladies in India to come to the jostle of the polling booth.

599. But the United Provinces is primarily a Hindoo province, is it not?—There is a very large majority of Hindoo residents, yes.

600. There is nothing in the Hindoo religion, is there, to prevent Hindoo women from freely appearing in public anywhere, and even voting, if they had a vote?—There are very large social difficulties about it.

601. Perhaps so; but is not the purdah a Mahommedan proposition, and would Hindoo women be really prevented by this consideration from voting?—I think in practice, whatever may be the history of the case, Hindoo ladies of standing would find very great difficulty in coming out to vote.

602. In Bengal, with reference to the special representation, are not the Mahommedans chiefly the descendants of converted Hindoos?—I have no doubt there is a substantial element of that class.

603. Are they not the majority?—I am not ethnologist enough to say that.

604. Is it the case that they retain very much the characteristics of Hindoos, and not the characteristics and zeal of converts? Do they not remain very much Hindoos as they were before?—I believe they adhere to a good many Hindoo practices.

605. Do you think, in proportion as they approximate to Hindoos, they stand in less need of communal representation?—I think their keenness as regards their own communal interests is just as great as if their Mohammedanism dated from the days of the Prophet.

606. You do think so?—Yes.

607. You are not familiar with the Lubbays and Moplahs, the converted Mahommedans of the South?—No.

608. Sir Henry Craik referred to the very strong powers, the very extraordinary and excessive powers, which Governors would be expected to exercise under this scheme, but cannot a Governor now actually override his Council? Is he not really, whenever he chooses to exercise the power, in an equally powerful position now?—His powers to override are defined by the law. They are strictly defined, and they are not absolutely discretionary.

609. He is the judge of when he may override?—Yes.

610. And he can do it by simply reporting to the Secretary of State what he has done?—He can follow the procedure under Section 50.

611. That

611. That being so, is it altogether correct to say that the new scheme puts the Governor in a position of extreme power, and far greater power than he has now? Well, I admit it does to a great extent, but not to the extent which is represented?—What I said was it added enormously to his labours and his responsibilities.

Chairman.] Thank you, Sir James.

(After a short adjournment.)

Chairman.] I should be much obliged if the gentlemen of the Press would take a note of this matter, also. The Clerk of the Committee has received very numerous letters from gentlemen representing deputations and other interests, and I think it would be for the convenience of all concerned if those gentlemen would note that the Clerk will be in attendance in his office at the House of Lords on Thursday afternoon next, from two to three o'clock, in order to answer any questions which these gentlemen desire to raise, and I think it will facilitate explanations very much if the gentlemen will kindly call and see the Clerk, instead of communicating by correspondence.

SIR CLAUDE H. HILL, K.C.S.I., C.I.E., called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

612. Sir Claude, you are a Member of the Council of the Government of India?—Yes.

613. And have been since what date?—Since April, 1915.

614. You are of opinion that, in view of the nature of some of the criticisms that have been levelled at the proposed system of government, it might be worth while to give the briefest outline of the developments which have led to the conclusion that the scheme of the joint Report is the only method of advance which has yet been proposed which fulfils the essential requirements of the case?—Yes.

615. We should be very glad if you would proceed on that assumption?—I have endeavoured to do so in the statement which I have put in. Would it be desired that I should read that statement?

616. I think you might go through it?—It was evident as early as 1912-13 that the system of administration, resulting from the Morley-Minto reforms—especially in relation to the constitution of the Legislative Councils in the Provinces, would require amplification and development very shortly. Except in Bengal there was, under that scheme, a nominated majority of members on all the principal Provincial Legislative Councils, and there was a general feeling in favour of an attempt being made to enlarge the elective element and to secure a wider electorate. It was also, I think, the general opinion that the solid official, or nominated block of votes, was responsible for the general and growing spirit of criticism of, and opposition to, Government measures on the part of the elected minorities. Schemes were informally and tentatively discussed which, while retaining full responsibility, were designed, with proper safeguards, to extend the powers of control or influence of the elected elements on the Councils; and these, after Lord Hardinge had left on record a Memorandum on the changes which he felt were called for in the constitution of the Administration, were taken into consideration by Lord Chelmsford's Administration in 1916. The resultant proposals were embodied in the Government of India's Despatch No. 17, dated 24th November, 1916. The proposals then laid before the Secretary of State were subjected to the criticism that they failed to devolve any form of responsibility. It came to be recognised that the responsibility, ultimately (at present) vesting in Parliament and exercised through the control of the Secretary of State for India, could only be devolved in so far as that responsibility was susceptible of discharge by some substituted representative authority. It was not to be expected that Parliament would abate its control in favour of the Indian bureaucracy. The announcement of the policy of H.M.'s Government on the 20th August, 1917, gave expression to this view in the words, "The policy of H.M.'s Government . . . . is the gradual development of self-governing institutions, with a view to the progressive realisation of responsible government in India as an integral part of the British Empire. They have decided that substantial steps in this direction should be taken as soon as possible. . . . This policy can only be achieved by successive stages." (3) The difficulty then was, as recognised by the Report, to frame a scheme which should, by successive stages, arrive at the goal of responsible government for India, while securing immediately substantial steps in that direction. Paragraph 101 of the joint report shows the impossibility of achieving the end in view by an elaboration or development of the system prevailing under the Morley-Minto scheme. The Congress

League proposals were worked out upon such lines, and the joint report had no difficulty in showing that their acceptance would merely mean the grant of power without responsibility, and must create very great embarrassment, while failing altogether to achieve the grant of responsibility by gradual steps. At the same time the difficulties in the way of a division in the administration were very clearly perceived by all who were engaged in considering the problem, and there was, at first, the greatest reluctance to contemplate any scheme based upon such a principle. The obvious drawbacks incidental to the existence of two authorities exercising equal jurisdiction in the same area were carefully visualised and examined: and these drawbacks were present to the minds of all who were at the discussions which preceded the framing of the Joint Report, and several of the members of the Government of India who were so present had had considerable first-hand practical experience of district administration. Schemes alternative to the one involving dualism in the Government were therefore carefully considered, with a view to seeing whether they could not be adapted to meet the requirement of "responsibility." I have here an example of such a scheme—I have not been able to get copies made of it—purely as an example, a scheme which I prepared myself for consideration before the pronouncement of August, 1917, and completed afterwards, and I put it forward only by way of example, as showing that I myself recognise that it fails to conform to the principle which was announced in August, 1917.

617. You will let us have that?—I shall be happy to put it in (handing in the same). After very protracted discussions, all inspired with the desire to avoid dualism if possible, on account of its admitted drawbacks and difficulties, those who took part in the discussions in the early months of 1918, were forced to the conclusion that if there was to be the grant of a measure of responsibility, and if that measure was to be framed so as to secure conformity with the requirement that it should be susceptible of development, by successive stages, up to the grant of full responsible government, then there was no alternative to a system under which the Government should be in two parts; and it is perhaps well worth stating that it was also recognised as being right and proper—quite independently of the declaration of policy (though this in itself was binding)—that there should be a delegation of responsibility. In this term we had in mind (a) that there should be direct personal responsibility for the Acts and Orders of Government by a Minister, and (b) that such Acts and Orders should be open to the criticism of the elected representatives of the Province to whom they would have to be justified by the Minister in charge of the Department of Government concerned. The conclusion recorded in the first sentence of paragraph 144 of the Joint Report had the full concurrence of the members of the Government of India. Speaking for myself, I should like to add that I am confident that the practical difficulties and drawbacks inherent in dualism can be very easily exaggerated. It is often represented, for example, that it will be very embarrasing if conflicting orders are received by a district officer from the two different parts of the Government. It may be admitted at once that this may happen, and that it is most embarrassing. It happens under the present system. But the embarrassment need not be very serious. In such a case, if there were irreconcileable conflict, it would be the district officer's obvious duty to refer the matter back back to Government for instructions, and it would be the function of the head of the administration to bring about discussion between the contending departments. In any event, such a contingency not only can (and does sometimes) arise under present conditions, but it is not peculiar to dualism, and would be quite as liable to occur under any extension of the existing system. (5) The position, as it eventually presented itself to me, may perhaps best be expressed as follows: (a) There was practical unanimity in favour of changes in the provinces' legislative councils, which would give a substantial majority of elected members and thus get rid of the official block which was admitted on all hands to be the most fruitful source of friction. I may say that was recognised long before any questions of reforms arose, and when I was a member of the Government of Bombay, before I joned the Government of India. (b) There was a preponderating feeling that, in regard to many of the departments of Government, the Legislative Councils should be allowed to control and direct policy. (c) It was held, on the other hand, that there were some departments—e.g., law and order, peace and good government, the public services, etc.—in respect of which delegation of unfettered control to the Legislative Councils would be impossible at present, and that such delegation would be unfair to the Legislative Councils themselves at the start. (d) Consequently certain restrictions upon the powers of the Legislative Councils were required. (e) In respect of matters falling under the category under which there was a preponderating feeling that the Legislative Councils should be allowed to control and direct policy, it was undesirable to grant such enormously increased powers to the Councils without simultaneously devising a scheme for fixing, directly or indirectly, upon the Legislative Councils, the responsibility for the Acts determined upon. (f) This could only be achieved through the medium of a Minister selected from the Council. If these premises be admitted, it is exceedingly difficult to avoid the conclusion arrived at in para. 215 of the Joint Report; and the proposals made in para. 218 seem to me to be the logical outcome. I have not personally seen any alternative scheme which attempts to comply fully with the announcement of H.M.'s Government, dated 20th August, 1917. Then turning to what has been specially criticised, as far as I have seen it, namely the question of certification, it is objected in some of the criticisms that the procedure necessitated by the system for securing to the responsible Executive the powers necessary to the discharge of its responsibilities is complex to the degree that there is risk of a breakdown. Such criticism is directed mainly at the machinery proposed to be set up in paragraph 252 of the Joint Report. That there is some complexity is admitted—the whole problem is, of course, complex. But we have to start from the fundamental position that the Provincial Government must have the affirmative power to pass what it considers essential legislation. The alternative methods of securing this are discussed in the paragraphs of the Report preceding paragraph 252. They are: (a) The Government of India might pass the necessary laws which a Local Legislature refuse to pass. (b) The Governor-General or the Governor-General in Council might promulgate Ordinances; and (c) the Governor of a Province or the Governor in Council might be given the power to promulgate Ordinances. These were discussed fully before the Joint Report was written, and the reasons given for emphatically rejecting them are recorded in paragraphs 248 to 251. These reasons seem to me to be fairly conclusive, and when the alternative method proposed in paragraph 252 of the Joint Report is considered it will probably be conceded that it is more consonant with the whole spirit of the proposals, especially in reference to the principle of provincial autonomy, and the gradual grant of full responsibility. (7) It is to be remembered that it is not obligatory upon a Governor to "certify" a measure for the Grand Committee. In respect of many measures which it would be within a Governor's competence to certify it will be open to him (and he will frequently exercise the option) to permit the measure to be introduced and dealt with in the Legislative Council in the ordinary course.

It will only be in cases falling within the defined category either of extreme importance or in cases in which, perhaps, racial feeling or political passion tend to thwart judgment that resort will have to be made to the certification procedure; and such cases will tend to become more and more rare as Legislative Councils, freed from the bondage of an official or nominated block, develop a sense of responsibility. It may be argued that, if this be so, there is the less objection to resort to one or other of the alternatives set forth in the preceding paragraphs. I venture to suggest that this is not so. Not only is it, in the view of Indians, likely to be preferred that, even if certificated, a measure should be discussed and debated by members having local knowledge and a first-hand interest in the issue, but such procedure has, I suggest, a positive value in relation to any measure. It cannot be too strongly insisted upon that the bureaucracy and Executive, with the best intentions, are liable to make mistakes and to misjudge the effects of measures. Discussion, locally, is of value, for even if such discussion is truncated by the Grand Committee procedure, it is taken part in by persons with local knowledge and representative of local interests, and cannot fail to be informative. Instances have occurred in the past in which ameliorative (as it was thought) legislation has been forced through the Legislative Councils against the unanimous opposition of the elected members. In some instances, no doubt, this has been justified by the results; but I could at all events cite one such instance in which the view taken by the non-official elected members proved to be justified. Thus the Grand Committee procedure, which will enable the responsible Government to secure the legislation which it holds to be necessary will thus ensure two results of some value: (a) The Government will not resort to it except in cases of real necessity, (b) even when resort has to be had to certification, the procedure in Grand Committee secures full discussion, within the province concerned, of the measure; and it is to that extent both more valuable and more consistent with a scheme tending to extend the principle of responsibility and the development of representative institutions than any alternative of which I am cognizant. It is these considerations, among others, which have induced the Government of India, in paragraph 79 of their first dispatch (the most important one, and, incidentally, the only general one I was able to sign before leaving India) of March 5, 1919, to adhere, definitely and strongly, to the Grand Committee proposals. (8) I would ask, Is the system so unduly complex in its working? It is this alleged complexity which has elicited the alternative plans of Sir R. Craddock and of the Government of Bombay, under which essential legislation should be "effectively passed by something short of a positive majority." But the complexity is more clearly inherent in those cases of mixed legislation (dealt with in paragraph 254 of the joint report and paragraph 83 of the Government of India dispatch of 5th March) than in the case of ordinary legislation which would be reserved under the formula for certification, and I suggest that the difficulties would be intensified, rather than being lessened or removed, by the adoption of the alternative suggested by Bombay. The atmosphere that would be generated in an Assembly dealing with a subject part of which would be determinable by absolute majority and part by something short of absolute majority would tend to become intolerable. That there is complexity, and that difficulties will be experienced in administering the procedure, may be admitted; but I have not seen a simpler solution which does not conflict with one or other of the objects inherent in the policy pronounced in August 1917. (9) The considerations which have aroused criticism of the Grand Committee procedure apply also in connection with the proposed changes in the Government of India legislature (paragraph 277 of the Joint Report) to the Council of State, and the feeling that the certification procedure, in relation to the Council of State, in needlessly complex has perhaps been partly generated by the observations and reservations contained in paragraph 117 of the Government of India's first dispatch and paragraphs 31 to 35 of the second dispatch (dated 16th April, 1919), as well well as by the Minute of Dissent recorded by Sir William Vincent. Doubts have also been expressed as to whether the certification procedure will not excite a feeling of antagonism on the part of the Legislative Assembly. It is not very profitable to attempt to forecast the psychological effect of a procedure resort to which will only be had on rare occasions; but since the only alternatives are still either the existence of a bare veto, legislation by ordinance, or (as has been suggested in the case of the Government of India legislature) legislation in joint session of the Assembly and Council of State, it is possible to contrast the relative merits of the alternatives. (10) Ordinance, and any other similar arbitrary devices, have been discussed in the report. They seem to me to be put out of court in the case of the Government of India Assembly for the same reasons (as mentioned in paragraph 6 of this note) as apply in the case of a provincial legislature. The device of legislation by joint session may at first sight seem attractive, as camouflaging, to some extent, the exercise of the underlying principle that the Government of India must be in a position to pass any legislation they consider essential; but I shall be rather surprised if Indian opinion prefers this to the certification procedure, which seems to me more straightforward and quite as likely to safeguard the position. If the joint session scheme has special merit on the ground that it affords a more ample safeguard, then, if the anticipation of a retaliatory attitude on the part of the Legislative Assembly in relation to the certification scheme is based on sound reasoning, it seems to me fairly certain that one result of joint sessions would be a degree of feeling between the two Chambers (as well as between the Assembly and the Government) which might quite easily result in a boycott of the joint session. I do not, however, feel that it is of much service to explore these speculative results. Moreover, any scheme for the composition of the two Chambers to secure support for the passing of measures in joint sessions, involving as it would a considerable increase in the official element, seemed to me to be undesirable in itself, if not unworkable. The adverse results apprehended from the Council of State procedure are mainly based on the assumption, which I do not endorse, that the scheme of reforms in the Indian administrative machine is going to be deliberately jeopardised by the politicians who are to profit by it. It is perhaps of greater moment to observe that if the views of the Government of India, as expressed in paragraphs 41 and 42 of the second despatch (dated the 16th of April, 1919), on the constitution of the Council of State are approved and carried into effect we shall have a second Chamber, largely constituted by direct election, which will have a special character of its own, and which will more nearly conform to the body contemplated in paragraph 278 of the Joint Report than would be the case if the Franchise Committee's Report be accepted. On this score there seem to me to be inherent advantages in the certification procedure as advocated in the Joint Report over the device of joint sessions.

618. Have you got a copy of the Bill there, Sir Claude?—I have, but I do not know whether it is the latest.

619. Will you turn to Clause 23?—I have only got a copy which shows the clauses in the form as amended by the Government of India. (A copy of the Bill is laid before the Witness.)

620. There is a question Lord Crewe asked me to ask Sir James Meston when he had, unfortunately, to leave the Committee for a short time. I am sorry I forgot to ask it of Sir James, so I will ask it of you, because either of you can speak for the Government of India equally well?—I should like, if I may, to qualify that: I do not speak for the Government of India in such an authoritative capacity as Sir James Meston.

621. I am sure you will be able to answer the question. On Clause 23 Lord Crewe wanted to know whether the objection of the Government of India to the excessive rule-making power contemplated in the Bill would be met by adopting the positive procedure of the pool by resolution in both Houses in place of silent acquiescence as proposed. Let me explain what the question means. Under the very common form of Parliamentary procedure, which is adopted in this

Bill to a large extent, a set of rules or an Order in Council, or some legislative provision of that kind, is laid on the table of the two Houses of Parliament for a certain number of days, 30 or 40, and at the end of that period it automatically assumes the force of law, unless either House has, in the interval, passed an address to His Majesty, asking him not to give his assent to it, or to amend it in a certain way. That is what Lord Crewe means by "silent acquiescence." An alternative plan has lately been coming into use by which a proposal or rule lies on the table of both Houses of Parliament, and both Houses have to pass a resolution asking His Majesty to give his assent to it. Lord Crewe wanted to know whether the objection of the Government of India to the excessive rule-making power now contained in the Bill would be met by adopting the positive procedure of the pool; that is to say, that each House would have to pass a resolution expressing its approval of the rule?—Speaking for myself, I should certainly say that would alter the case very materially, and I believe, although I would rather that this was endorsed by Sir James Meston on behalf of the Government of India, that that would very materially modify their views in respect of this clause. I think I might go so far as to say that it would largely remove them, judging by the terms of the comments they have made upon that subject.

622. May I ask, Sir James, whether you confirm that?—(Sir James Meston) Entirely.

Mr. Montagu.

623. (To Sir Claude Hill.) I should like to confine myself entirely to one point of history and to one point in your Memorandum which you have read. You were a member of the Government of India when this reform scheme was drawn up. Is it not true to say that, except for a formal record of assent on every detail and part of the scheme itself, every effort was made to obtain the approval of the members of the Government of India?—Absolutely true.

624. And in most cases is it not true to say that where there was difference of opinion Committees were appointed, on several of which you served, with a view to arriving at an agreed form of amendment?—That is quite correct.

625. Meanwhile, in your experience of India, have you ever known an undertaking upon which the Local Governments had so many opportunities of expressing their opinion?—I do not know that I can give a categorical answer to that, Mr. Montagu, but I take it that what you mean is that they had every possible opportunity of expressing their opinion at different stages.

626. The heads of Local Governments, I understand, had never collectively been to Delhi or Simla before?—Never.

627. They had all communicated several letters, which were discussed with them?—Yes.

628. And they met the Government of India in joint consultation?—Yes.

629. Were you present this morning?—Yes, I was.

630. You heard Lord Sydenham's question to Sir James Meston on the subject of the share of the Local Governments in the scheme?—Yes.

631. It was with a view to this question I am asking: What do you think would be the relative acceptability in India of these three schemes—the scheme of the Joint Report or the scheme of the majority of the Local Governments or the scheme of the Joint Report as amended by the Government of India?—I should say that the acceptance would be greatest in the case of the scheme of the Joint Report; next in the case of the scheme as amended by the Government of India; and lastly by a great deal the scheme advocated by the heads of the Local Governments. I am speaking now of Indian opinion in the aggregate.

632. You have discussed in the Memorandum you have just read to us the practical difficulties and drawbacks inherent in dualism, and stated that you were of opinion that they were much exaggerated. May I take you for a moment to a consideration of what I think has been called here a composite Government, such as the Local Governments proposed, a Government in which there were two non-officials and two officials sitting as a united Government and responsible for all decisions, very much like a joint Executive Government. Under that scheme what would happen in your opinion if the officials differed from the non-officials; who would decide?—Who would have to decide?

633. Yes?—Clearly in the last resort it would devolve on the Governor to decide in the case of a sharp division of opinion of that kind.

634. Therefore it would be the duty of the Governor to compose the frictions and difficulties between the two parts of his Government?—Yes.

635. Precisely as is alleged to occur under a dual Government?—I cannot see any very great difference in degree in the difficulties in the two cases.

636. Supposing in the composite Government the Governor decided against the non-official members of his Government on a vital issue, what would happen?—That is the difficulty I was up against myself in endeavouring to formulate a scheme which should comply with the requirements of the case. Several things might happen—either the non-official members forming the two members of the Government might have to resign if they felt sufficiently strongly on the subject, or if they did not resign they might not be in a position to carry the Legislative Council with them. In that event there would be a very difficult position set up as between the Executive and the Legislative Council, and it is precisely the difficulties arising from a case of that kind, and the uncertainty of what the consequential results might be, that make that particular form of Government, to my mind, peculiarly difficult to contemplate.

637. Now, when the heads of the Local Governments attended at Delhi the last time in January of this year, were you there?—Yes; I was present.

638. They all came with different schemes; I mean there was a scheme, was there not, which had been propounded in a published letter by the head of the Punjaub Government?—There were various schemes under general purview, but I do not know that they each of them brought a scheme. I do not know whether that was precisely what they did.

639. Did you discuss with them, or any of them, the scheme which had been contained in their letters?—No; what happened was, I think, speaking from memory, that his Excellency the Viceroy interviewed the heads of the Local Governments, and asked if they would consider the possibility of drafting a scheme upon which there could be agreement, and our part in the discussion, that is to say, the members of the Council, arose after that scheme had been circulated to us for our cognisance and opinion.

640. I want to put to you a question about that, but I do not want to press it if you cannot tell me the answer. I notice in the Blue Book a Memorandum by a Committee of the Government of the United Provinces (pp. 216 and 217) which was generally commended by the Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces. It is a scheme for a United Government of four Executive Councillors, with a division into transferred and reserved subjects, and with the statement that the Governor would normally defer to the advice of the non-official members in respect of the transferred subjects. Was that scheme discussed att all at Delhi?—It was not discussed with the Government of India when I was present. I should like, if I may, with the Chairman's permission, to ask Sir James Meston whether he corroborates me on this point?

Chairman.] Certainly.

Sir James Meston.] Yes.

Mr. Montagu.

641. (To Sir Claude Hill.) I come back to your Memorandum, and I want to confine myself to one point upon it. Take first the Government of India: The composition of the Council of State is, according to the recommendations of your Government, and I think according to the Joint Report, to be such that the Government can be sure of getting through it any legislation it requires: That is so, is it not?—Yes.

642. Therefore the only difference in the last resort between legislation through that Council of State and an Ordinance is the discussion which will have preceded the actual vote. Is that so?—The discussion is the essential difference. I think there is a virtue inherent in the procedure itself, quite apart from discussion, inasmuch as there is publication, and there is the possibility of criticism, which is of immense value. It is not merely that discussion in the Council of State which differentiates the——

643. All I want to ask is this: Is there any real difference. You have dealt admirably, if I may say so, with the alternative proposals, but is there any real difference—I do not want to guide you—but do you suggest that there is any difference between discussion in the Council of State, followed by a vote in the Council of State, and discussion in the Legislative Assembly, followed by an Ordinance?—Speaking for myself personally, I see a very material difference, and the essential difference to my mind lies in the ultimate possibilities of development based upon the institution of the Council of State. I see a positive virtue, if I may say so, in the proposed constitution of the Council of State.

644. Supposing the Council of State were not to be an instrument for the recording of Ordinances, but a Revising Chamber, would it have the same complexion as is proposed in the Joint Report?—I should say its complexion would probably be similar, but might be very different in points of detail, and it would still, as a Revising Chamber at the present date, having regard to the pronouncement, have to possess the quality of being the instrument ultimately in the last resort of getting legislation through in some form.

Sir Henry Craik.

645. There are just two or three questions I would like to ask. You described, Sir Claude, the difficulty which you think would occur in the event of disallowance of the acts of the Ministers just now, in answer to Mr. Montagu. You think a very serious situation would arise?—Yes.

646. Why do you think it would be less if the procedure by certification were to be called in? Would not equal difficulties arise?—I am not sure that I follow you, Sir Henry. At what stage do you refer to difficulty arising?

647. The disallowance, in certain cases, under another scheme—not under this scheme. If certain acts of the Ministers were disallowed you said that very serious difficulties would occur?—I understood Mr. Montagu's question to have relation to administrative matters, and not to be in connection with the Legislative Council solely, and mainly to relate to differences of opinion between the Indian members of the Executive Council and the official members of the Executive Council.

648. Even in administrative matters would not the same difficulties arise if interference were to be exercised?—I suggest there would be very considerable difficulty directly you have Ministers responsible for certain transferred subjects. There is a great difference between that and a unified Government, in which there would be four members all jointly responsible for the whole Acts of the Government.

649. You mean that the disallowing of their joint responsibility would lead to much more serious consequences?—What I felt was that in the hypothetical joint responsibility case there would be a greater difficulty with the Government non-official members, and that the situation which would result would be extremely difficult of assuagement by the Governor.

650. On page 3 of your Statement you indicated a scheme which you prepared yourself; would it be possible for you to indicate anything of the nature of that scheme, and what made it, as you think, fail? You say that it was found to fail?—Yes; I think I can quite shortly do so, Sir Henry. My scheme was not at all dissimilar from that proposed by the heads of the Local Governments in essentials. I was endeavouring to see whether a development of the present system under the Morley-Minto reforms was not possible.

651. That is the increase of the Indian element?—That is so, and a large increase in the elected element, and a unified Government at the top. I came to this position at last; I contemplated that an elected member of the Legislative Council should be selected by the the Governor as the Governor selects a Minister, namely, on the principle of securing the man most likely to be able to command a following in the Assembly; further, that he should be given a Portfolio and paid a salary in precisely the same manner as his other colleagues on the Council. He would be definitely in charge of certain Departments, probably some of those that would have been given over to the hypothetical Ministry in the Round Table Scheme (I was referring to matters that were then under discussion). His position would be one of great influence, but it would be a difficult one. He would be bound so long as he consented to retain office to support the Government's programme as a whole, and to do his best to get support to his policy in all Departments. If he was unable to do this he would be able to resign, in which case the Governor could send for another member and offer the Ministry to him. In an extreme case it is possible the Governor might find himself unable to find an elected member of the Assembly with influence sufficient to secure the support necessary to carry through Government measures. In that event there would have to be a power of dissolution, and at that stage I went on to say that that might possibly get over the difficulty, and I was anxious that some risk might possibly be taken to get over the difficulty in that way, but I recognised that it might lead to an impasse.

652. That, you think, was where it failed?—Yes.

653. Only one other question. On the next page you refer to the embarrassment which will occur if a district councillor receives conflicting orders from two different parts of the Government, and you go on to say: "In any event such a contingency does sometimes arise under present conditions." Is that the case?—Oh, yes. I have myself as a district officer received orders certainly not entirely in unison from two different Departments of the Executive Government.

654. Of course, it is very easy to imagine that these two Departments had misunderstood or were working at cross-purposes, but you do not suggest that they were animated by any different motives—they were not essentially opposed one to the other, were they?—I would not go so far as to say that, Sir Henry, but what I do maintain is that from the point of view of the district officer the motives at work in bringing about the issue of contrary orders do not matter; the difficulty to him is the same whether it comes from two Departments which have conflicting views or two sections of the Government.

655. But these two Departments in this case would be under the same master, and could very soon be brought into their ranks again?—The procedure would have to be identical in both cases, I think. In such a case if there was conflict between two members of the Council it would have to go to the Governor.

Chairman.

656. I want to be quite sure that I understood your answer to Sir Henry. Is this your point, that under a unitary system, given the division of subjects into transferred and reserved, the position of the Indian members of the Executive, chosen largely because of their influence with the Legislative Council, would be much more difficult than under the principle of dualism, because the Council might hold them responsible for some of the decisions which affected the reserved subjects to which they had as a matter of fact objected, but for which they are held responsible as part of the unitary Government; is that your point?—Partly that and partly I wanted inferentially to show that they failed to confer responsibility at all—in other words, the unified Government camouflaged the responsibility of the Minister altogether, but despite that the difficulties of the member selected from the Council would be such that he must, unless he could get a following, resign, although he would not have the satisfaction of feeling that he was really solely responsible.

The Duke of Northumberland.

657. With reference to paragraph 8, on page 8 of your memorandum, where you are talking of these alternative schemes you say: "The atmosphere that would be generated in an Assembly dealing with a subject, part of which would be determinable by absolute majority, and part by something short of absolute majority, would tend to become intolerable." I am afraid I do not quite understand that; would the measures be so complicated that they would result in that?—I think the hypothesis is this: The Bombay Government accepted the instruction for passing certain measures, and their scheme, if I understand it aright, contemplates that either the whole measure or a part of the measure would be such as to fall within that category, and that in that event it might be necessary to treat either the complete measure or parts of that measure by the method of short-of-a-positive-majority vote.

658. There is one other question on page 9 at the bottom of paragraph 10, in speaking of joint sessions: "It seems to me fairly certain that one result of joint sessions would be a degree of feeling between the two chambers as well as between the Assembly and the Government, which might quite easily result in a boycott of the joint sessions": would not that consideration apply equally to the procedure of Grand Committees?—Of course, there is that consideration, but I do not think it is likely to arise in the case of the Grand Committee system. My object was to try to express my opinion that the exacerbation caused by different views being held, and the application of the procedure of joint sessions would be to bring into closer contact the difficulties and to aggravate them.

Major Ormsby Gore.

659. You said, in answer to a question, that you thought that there was positive virtue in the Council of State. Does that mean that you think that the normal working of the Council of State as a bi-cameral system is an important thing to make plain in India?—I personally hold that view.

660. You do not extend that view to the Provinces; you do not think there would be a positive virtue in establishing the bi-cameral system in the Provinces? Personally, I am rather inclined to hold that view.

661. On that point, if you had a bi-cameral system in the Provinces would it help you to get rid of the Grand Committee system? Would it constitute a fifth alternative? There are the three rejected in the Report, and one adopted, so that the bi-cameral system would be a fifth alternative, would it not, imposing a check on the Legislative Council of the Provinces?—I understood your first question about the bi-cameral system for the Provinces to be an abstract one?

662. Yes?—And now you want my opinion as to whether its application in a concrete form would possibly form an alternative to this?

663. Yes?—I am afraid my answer to that must be very unsatisfactory. It would require a very great deal of consideration in detail to devise a bi-cameral system which would be such as to render unnecessary something in the nature of the certification procedure.

664. Do you contemplate that this certification procedure will be required fairly often, or only in very rare instances?—My own view is that it will not be very frequently necessary to apply it.

665. And really whether the procedure is by certification and Grand Committee, or whether it is by Ordinance, in both cases public opinion in India will hold the Governor responsible; it will be really the act and personal responsibility of the Governor which takes the matter out of the hands of the elected majority of the Legislative Council, and they will hold him personally resposible, will they not?—He is responsible for the decision.

666. You think that the procedure by certification and Grand Committee will be less of a political burden on his shoulders than if he were to proceed by Ordinance?—Yes; I think so.

667. It would not expose him to the same amount of political criticism?—That is so.

668. The reason given in the Report against the procedure by Ordinance is largely that no Provincial Governor has had the power since 1833; that is the argument?—That is so; that is part, at all events, of the argument.

669. As to the bi-cameral system in the Provinces, has it been suggested by many people in India?—No it has received very very little support.

670. Has it received any support from Indian opinion as opposed to British opinion?—I can only say that I know one or two individual Indians with whom I have discussed it, who are not unfavourable, but it has not received any public expression of approval, so far as I am aware.

671. Do you share the view which I gather is now held by the Government of India, that the Council of State—that is to say, the Second Chamber of the All-India Government—should be given a more senatorial character—that is to say, elected on a special senatorial franchise?—I hold that myself very definitely.

672. Should we consider a bi-cameral scheme for the Provinces you would favour a somewhat simpler franchise?—Probably.

673. Then you say on page 7 of your memorandum that you know of instances where the views of the elected members have been justified by results. I do not want to press you for an instance you do not want to give us, but can you give me some idea of the sort of subjects in which that has been the experience?—The instance I had in mind was an instance in which the Executive Government of Bombay introduced a Bill designed to prevent the transfer of land to non-agriculturists in a certain area. The elected representatives, who were then very few in number, but included Mr. Gokhale and Sir Pherozeschah Mehta, after doing their best to oppose the measure, retired from the Chamber, feeling it was hopeless to influence matters, and the Bill was passed. That was in the year 1900. I made inquiries some years ago as to how far that Act had proved effective, and I was told that it was seldom applied, and had proved very ineffective indeed. That is the instance I had in mind.

674. You speak on page 9 of your memorandum of the procedure by Ordinance "and other similar arbitrary devices." Has there been a growing opinion in India against the procedure by what you may describe as arbitrary devices, because in the old days in India practically the whole of the Government was very largely by arbitrary devices, was it not?—I had in mind the old system of regulation. That was what I had in mind in using that term "other devices," and, of course, until the establishment of deliberative Assemblies to assist in making laws and regulations that was practically the only method of legislation in India.

675. That is to say, the Indian people really have rapidly become accustomed and agreeable to the modern and Western methods of procedure by deliberation, rather than by arbitrary devices and things of that kind?—That is so.

676. Already political education has taken place in India during recent years on these lines?—Yes.

Mr. Bennett.

677. From the facts, Sir Claude, that on the one side you have five Local Governments and on the other side you have the Government of India taking quite an opposite view, you would not infer that provincial experience goes in the one direction and central experience—the experience of Central Government—in another, would you?—That is a very difficult question to answer, and I should say that you would be mistaken in drawing the inference that provincial experience ran in the opposite direction. It is conceivable, for example, that the Provincial Government, constituted later or earlier, would have taken a different view.

678. You yourself have had a wide provincial experience, and a very varied experience in all Departments of Government in India, have you not, and a wide experience as between provincial and central administration?—I have been associated with both.

679. Captain Ormsby Gore put to you a question as to your estimate of the Council of State, and you referred to the inherent value of the discussion of a measure in the Council of State. Were you, in saying that, committing yourself to the principle of a bi-cameral constitution, or was it in a relative way that you so spoke—as to the inherent value of discussion?—That was relative, and merely in continuation of what I said about the discussion in Grand Committee in the Provinces.

680. We are not to infer from what you said that you are in favour of the principle of a bi-cameral constitution for India?—I do not know whether I am in order, Sir, or whether it is very relevant to give my personal opinion, but I have a feeling myself that there are factors in the organisation of Indian Society which might have been met more effectively by some system based on a bi-cameral constitution. I do not think myself, if I may say so with respect, that at the present time that has very much relevance to the matter under consideration.

Mr. Bennett—continued.

681. You say that for yourself, not for the Government?—Merely for myself.

Mr. Bennett.

682. We all admit that it would be a great advantage to reduce the areas of friction, would it not, in the working of the new scheme? Will not the Grand Committee add very largely to the area of possible friction?—As contrasted with what, may I ask?

683. Absolutely; you get a conflict between the Government and the popular party in the Legislative Chamber, and then the contest will be carried on in the Grand Committee, and finally there may be the action of the Governor. That means at least three areas of conflict. If we could reduce those three to two would not that be an advantage?—My own personal view is expressed in the statement I have made. I think there is positive value in the discussion of subjects which a Local Government may feel it essential should be carried through, and there should be public discussion of them, rather than that there should be the mere executive acts of the executive Government, and for that reason, even if there is heat generated, I think on the whole it is an advantage to have that heat generated in public rather than in private.

684. You have spoken of the working of the composite Government. What would you say as to the educative value of a composite Government, as compared with a dualistic Government. I mean educative as regards the Indian authorities who are associated with it?—My view is that there can be very little comparison in an educative aspect between the work transacted by a Minister who is personally responsible, has to come to personal decisions, and has to defend them himself, as contrasted with a member of a unified Executive who is only ostensibly responsible, and may not even be called upon to defend personally a decision to which he personally has come.

685. From the point of view of efficiency, how would you compare the two Governments? Would an Indian politician made a Minister be as efficient—would he be likely to be as efficient if he had full responsibility, or only that imperfect responsibility which it is proposed to give him under the scheme of government?—Do you mean his personal efficiency?

686. Yes?—I should think his personal efficiency, if I may say so, would probably be a constant factor; but the tendency would be to teach him efficiency in the exercise of responsibility, I think.

Lord Islington.

687. You lay stress on this question of personal responsibility, and I would like to ask you one or two questions about it. I suppose you would admit, would you not, that a Minister of the Crown in this country has, personally, responsibility, although he is a Member of the Cabinet?—I imagine so.

688. Would not your answers to Mr. Bennett rather lead to the position that it is only by giving isolated authority and responsibility that experience will come to a Minister?—I think the question which Mr. Bennett asked me was whether, in my opinion, experience would be gained more rapidly and more efficiently by responsibility or no responsibility, and my opinion was that if responsibility was added to duty it would be so.

689. Do you not consider that the responsibility of an individual Minister is compatible with Cabinet rule?—I do not feel very competent to answer that particular question, as I have no experience, Lord Islington. I do not think I have said anything to justify the assumption that I hold a contrary view.

690. I want to ask you another question, based upon a question that Mr. Bennett put; because it is on this extremely extremely difficult subject that we are all groping in the dark about—and have done for years—and we want to find the solution of it. Mr. Bennett put to you a question with regard to the antagonistic opinions expressed as between the Central Government and the Provincial Governments: Should not I be accurate in saying that they are not actually antagonistic proposals, but the Provincial Governments are trying to seek a solution in accordance with the practical difficulties that they see they would have the experience, but at the same time are seeking to attain the same object as that of the Government of India?—I find it a little difficult to answer that direct question, and perhaps I might explain my position a little.

691. Certainly?—I feel that in this matter the head of a Provincial Government is necessarily at closer grips with the details of the administration for which he has responsibility, and his tendency naturally is, I think, to take, perhaps—I do not use the word in an offensive sense—a somewhat narrower view of the conditions under which he is able effectively to meet his responsibilities, and I think for that reason perhaps the opinion of the head of the Local Government might be expected to be more in accordance with past traditions; in other words, that what he knows ought possibly even to lead him to be less willing to incur an innovation than the people further aloof from the immediate details of the administration. I am sorry I am a little cumbrous, but I have tried to get at what you mean.

692. You would say this, would you not, that, apart from all that if there are two lines of approach to this subject, one taken up by five Local Governments in India and one taken up by the Government of India, if you want to get a solution every effort should be made to try to bring those two closer together, provided they can be brought together compatibly with certain principles?—I do not think that would necessarily follow. I do not think you can avoid looking to the personal factor to a certain extent in estimating the value of opinions received, and it is the case that the Government of India, for example, had three men who had been members of Provincial Governments on its composition at the time. They happened to hold somewhat different views. It might quite easily have happened that by transposing the positions they occupied you might have had the Provincial Governments taking the view which was taken by the Government of India, and vice versa. I do not say it would have been so, but you cannot get away from the personal factor, I think.

693. I will not press that point further; your proposal is one of a dualised Government somewhat in isolation. If you could get all the main advantages of this dualised system in company and still in isolation, with all the advantages derived from company composite discussion, and so on, would you say that would be an advantage?—Emphatically; and I may mention that both in the Joint Report and in the Government of India's first dispatch we laid very great stress on the desirability of joint consultation and joint deliberation whenever it is possible.

694. The Government of India's proposal is joint consultation and consideration rather as an exception. Now, if that principle of regarding it as an exception were converted into its being the normal arrangement, would you agree to that?—I should agree to that; but may I ask, Lord Islington, what sentence you are referring to in the Government of India's dispatch?

695. I cannot give you the reference at the moment; but the whole principle of the proposal is the Minister and the Governor and the Governor and his Executive Council and, on occasions, consideration jointly?—I should have put it the other way, from my recollection of the Government of India's views, although Sir James Meston could give a later impression. My feeling throughout has been that we all of us felt that the more joint deliberation there was the better.

696. You would favour the Bill laying down that all those matters should be matters for a collective consideration—that it should be precisely laid down as such?—Would it not, consistently with the whole scheme of the Bill, have to be qualified by the differentiation of responsibility in the Bill itself?

697. Yes, I am assuming that—the differentiation of responsibility, but collective consideration: would you generally agree to that?—I should prefer to see a draft of it before expressing an opinion.

698. That is a good answer, but it does not answer my question, I am afraid. There is just one other question I would like to ask, if I may. As regards the control of the Government of India over the provincial Governments in connection with reserved subjects, am I right in saying that the scheme as at present does not suggest any material modification of the control of the Government of India over the Provincial Governments in regard to reserved subjects?—I think the scheme contemplates as much relaxation as is compatible with the principle applying to reserved subjects, and in so far as the Legislative Council's control is not operative, we are still merely the agents of Parliament; but there should be as much devolution within that principle as is possible.

699. From your experience (I do not desire to press this question as you are now a member of the Government of India) as a member of the Bombay Government, did you find during that time you might have had more matters left to your discretion and a less number of questions to be submitted to the Government of India for decision, and that that would have enhanced the efficiency of Government in Bombay?—I think that every Provincial Government or member of it would say yes.

700. You say yes to that?—I naturally would; I think it is human nature.

701. Did you find on occasions that administration of an urgent and important character which required to be carried out expeditiously was unduly delayed on account of sanction being held up by the Government of India?—I think delays are inherent in all control by reference, but I cannot say that I personally had any complaint to make on that score in connection with my Departments. I cannot recall any at the moment.

702. I will ask you another question which I would like your opinion on if you are prepared to give it: With a view to securing this more expeditious method of getting over a great area like India, would you think that in some matters the Secretary of State might control them instead of the Governor-General, and that that might make for a more rapid decision?—I cannot conceive that it should; the Secretary of Setate is at a greater distance and is more inaccessible, and I cannot conceive that, assuming things are properly organised, it would not be more expeditious, more satisfactory, and more susceptible of settlement by discussion to have the authority in India.

703. You may assume, of course, that the telegraph is brought into play?—Personal discussion is always possible in the other case.

704. However, you are not prepared to say you can see any opportunity of arriving at a more expeditious treatment of a matter in that way?—No, I think not.

705. I have had a suggestion more than once made to me which I would like to have your opinion upon, by way of securing this more expeditious treatment of matters in Provincial Governments. It is suggested that a Provincial Government might be given discretion to deal with all matters within its Budget Estimate for the year, and then report to the Government of India, the Government of India then scrutinising that report and discovering what it might deem to require correction, and would give the correction found. I have had that suggestion made to me and I would like to know whether you have ever considered it, and whether you think there would be any practical benefit in that?—The Finance Department happens to be the only Department of Government with which I have never been associated, but I cannot primâ facie see precisely what is to be gained by the scheme you suggest.

706. I am assuming that by being given discretion within the Budget Estimate would mean that there are many matters which now have to receive the sanction of the Government of India before they can be actually executed which could be executed within the year by the Provincial Government?—Who is sanctioning the Budget Estimate? Who settles the Budget? Is the Local Government to have complete discretion to settle its Budget?

707. That would be the same as the present practice; I am assuming the present practice?—Then I am am not quite clear what the proposition involves as a change.

708. Perhaps it is too involved a subject to enter into now. Assuming the Government of India sanctions the Budget for the Provincial Government for the year, then all matters which come within the purview of that Budget could be carried on by the Provincial Government without, as I understand often is the case, having first to obtain the sanction of the Government of India?—Yes, normally, I think in 99 cases out of 100 they do, and are in a position to carry on on that basis, because it usually happens that a project or scheme comes up for sanction before it is ever entered as a Budget Estimate. What happens as a rule is that the project is sanctioned subject to Budget provision, and as soon as the Local Government can insert the project in the Budget it automatically comes within their competence to carry out. I would ask that Sir James Meston might be asked to elucidate any budget point which I have missed.

Lord Sinha.

709. I just want to ask this, Sir Claude: Is it the fact or not that if there is one reform which all shades of Indian political opinion have asked for long before the Report as well as after the Joint Report it is this: That the Executive Councils both under the Imperial Government, that is the Central Government, and the Provincial Governments should consist in equal numbers of officials and non-officials?—I am not aware that that is so.

710. Do you know that there has been an actual demand of that nature?—No; I think that demand so expressed is a very recent development.

711. Do you remember what is called the Nineteen Members' Memorandum?—I understood you to say, "for a long time past"?

712. I said both before the Report and after the Report?—I understood that "for a long time past" meant years ago.

713. No; from before the Report as well as after the Report, that there has been one claim made by Indian political opinion that there should be a division half and half of the Executive Councils?—If you ask me whether I am aware that it is an effective demand apart from what has been published, say, by the demands of the Nineteen or otherwise, I should say no.

714. I do not know if we are at one with regard to the meaning which I attach to the word "demand." I meant a claim put forward?—Put in that way I have not been conscious of it; I have not heard it often expressed in these terms.

715. As regards the bi-cameral system, so far as the Government of India is concerned the suggested Council of State is to be primarily a body for passing legislation which the Government cannot otherwise get passed through the other Chamber, that is the Legislative Assembly. That is the primary purpose of the Council of State, is it not?—That is one of its chief purposes.

716. In other words, to register the decree of the Executive Government?—It is a substitute for the system of Grand Committees proposed for the provinces.

717. Its function would be to register what the Executive Government desires by way of legislation?—I should not express it myself in that way.

718. Would there be anything incorrect if I put it in that way?—I should say there is a great deal more in the functions of the Council of State than would be implied by the expression you have used, Lord Sinha.

719. I will take that. Is it consistent with that function, which I think you agree is the primary function, to have to impart to it also a senatorial character?—You are assuming that I have assented to its description as being merely a machine for registering the——

720. No; I said the primary function; that is the primary object with which the body is to be established now.

Chairman.

721. I do not know what Sir Claude's opinion is, but he did not say so?—No, I did not assent to that. and that is not my opinion.

Chairman—continued.

722. Not even to the point I have put, that its primary function as now designed is to pass legislation that the Government cannot get passed otherwise?—I said, I think, that it was a substitute for a Grand Committee, and that it was one of its chief functions.

723. Perhaps if you will pardon my pressing you—is it its primary function? What distinction are you making between primary and chief?—My view is that the Chamber contemplated in the Council of State is a Chamber which will perform very useful functions of varying characters. It has partly the attributes of a Second Chamber, inasmuch as legislation will have to pass both Chambers, and it is only incidentally and on occasion that resort will have to be had for the passing of measures through the Council of State alone which would ordinarily have to pass through the Legislative Assembly also.

724. But the character must be such as to ensure the latter, must it not?—That is the reason for the constitution proposed.

725. Quite. I put it to you: Would it not be inconsistent with the senatorial character—a senate free to pass or to reject?—I think the words used were that it should partake of the character of a council of elder statesmen in the Report.

726. I was suggesting to you that it could not be senatorial, inasmuch as the constitution must be such as to carry out the object of getting affirmative legislation required by the Government?—I am afraid I am not very skilful in a matter of interpretation of that kind.

727. I put the point just to see whether you agreed with me or not. With regard to the Provincial Governments, I understood you to say that joint deliberations would be the normal rule between the two sections of the Government—the two parts of the Government, the official and the popular—and I take it that that would extend to all important matters, including finance?—That, I think, is certainly the view.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

728. In reply to Lord Islington, you spoke of the delays as between the Central Government and the Provincial Governments. In your experience would you say that the delays were mainly caused by the Government of India or by the Provincial Governments, or do you consider that the reference here is to the Secretary of State?—I think they are both contributory causes; it is very difficult to say offhand which occasions the greater delay, but the delay varies from time to time. I really could not give a useful opinion upon that point. There are delays involved in both procedures, and it is impossible, I think, to say which causes the greatest delay.

729. Do you call to mind a number of delays on small questions which have been banded about between India and Whitehall, or were you thinking of the larger questions?—I was thinking rather of the larger questions, for example, land reform policy and public works schemes, with which I am more familiar, and in respect of that they require very considerable examination. Under existing Regulations they require the sanction of the Secretary of State, who has to consult his advisers, and it is inevitable that so long as those restrictions involving reference are in force there must be delay in replying on big questions of that sort requiring examination.

730. Leaving out the war, which was an abnormal time, would you say that these delays, the references to Simla, have varied very much under different Viceroys? I do not ask for names, but have different Governments had different effects, or have they always been the same?—I think such things must vary from time to time, and I find it very difficult to answer that question. I would rather not express an opinion.

731. One other question. With regard to the educational value of responsibility, to which do you attach most importance in relation to this scheme, the giving complete autonomy or as complete as possible to the Legislative Council on a smaller number of subjects, or a less complete autonomy over a larger number of subjects?—Are you referring to the educative value to the Legislative Council or to the Minister?

732. Supposing it were a question that there are twenty subjects to deal with, would you rather that ten of those were transferred for the educational value and ten reserved, but with very considerable powers reserved, of transferring again by the Legislative Council, or would you rather have five given entirely and fifteen reserved? I am only taking any figures?—I think, as Sir James Meston in one of his answers said, one of the objects in view is to secure the possibility of examining how far responsibility has been discharged satisfactorily with a view to a further grant of responsibility. From that point of view nothing can, to my mind, be so valuable as the delegation of complete responsibility even in a smaller number of cases, because directly responsibility is shared it ceases to be a valid test.

733. For that purpose you would be prepared with regard to a limited number of subjects to risk failures of administration in some instances for the educational purpose?—Well, I think we necessarily, all of us, are agreed that you must be prepared, up to a certain point, to sacrifice efficiency for the purpose of the educative value of the experiment.

734. I do not ask you, with regard to specific provinces, but do you think the results would be very different in different provinces?—The results of the application of the scheme now in the Bill?

735. The results of giving a responsibility which might not always be wisely exercised?—I think it might be quite different in different provinces; I think there is a difference in the degree of political sagacity in different parts of India.

736. On the whole, do you agree with the classification adopted by the Indian Government?—The classification with regard to the composition of Legislative Councils?

737. Subjects transferred and reserved?—Generally speaking, yes; but not entirely. I agree with some reservations.

738. Would you have been disposed, if it were possible, to transfer subjects in some provinces which would not be transferred in others?—I think that might be possible; it might be very difficult, but, speaking generally, the Subjects Committee's recommendations have been followed by the Government of India. There are only a few modifications suggested, and there are differences. For example, Bombay has been given forests and other provinces have not. In that way there have been differences reflecting the view of the Functions Committee, endorsed by the Government of India, and there are different grades of advancement.

739. I do not want to go into details, but in one single question, are you of opinion that the Governor would be fitted to bear the whole of the responsibilities which have been placed upon him, or do you think it would be desirable, if possible, to relieve him of some of them?—Speaking generally, I do not see why he should not be fitted to discharge all the responsibility that it is proposed to put upon him, because, if I may venture to say so, I think it is not quite realised the extent of the assistance which is available for him, and on which he will, as in the past, very largely lean; and as I think was mentioned in the answer to one question, it is considerations of that character, for example, which induced the Government of India to suggest that there should be two executive members of Council in certain Provinces.

740. Do you apply that equally to the Government of Bombay and where an Englishman would obviously not have the same experience as a Lieutenant-Governor who had been trained in India?—Yes.

Sir Henry Craik.

741. I would like your opinion on the question of the division—what is called in the Despatch of the Government of India the horizontal division rather than the vertical—do you think any of the desirable objects you wish to attain would be carried out to a certain extent by this horizontal division?—We went into all that very carefully, and I endorse the conclusion that on the whole the answer is in the negative.

742. You do not think to any extent at all——?—I do not say that.

743. You do think it might to some extent?—I say that the other method is the only method which complies with the requirements of the case fully.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Duke of NORTHUMBERLAND.
Lord BRODRICK (Viscount Midleton).
Lord ISLINGTON.
Lord SYDENHAM.
Lord SINHA.
Mr. BENNETT.
Sir HENRY CRAIK.
Mr. MONTAGU.
Major ORMSBY GORE.
Sir J. D. REES.

THE RT. HON. LORD BRODRICK (VISCOUNT MIDLETON) IN THE CHAIR.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).] Before the public come in, Lord Southborough, we understand that Sir Frank Sly, a member of your Committee, is in attendance. Would you like him to sit beside you and answer any questions which you feel inclined to delegate to him?

Lord Southborough.] I should be very glad to have him here, but I do not want to take any course which would prevent his being called as an independent witness.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).] There is sometimes a great convenience when taking the evidence of a witness who appears on behalf of a Committee, if another leading member of it is going to be heard, to have him present also so that if necessary a question may be referred to him. It would not prevent Sir Frank Sly being examined himself. Does the Committee agree?

(Agreed.)

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).] Then we call Sir Frank Sly also.

The Rt. Hon. Lord SOUTHBOROUGH, G.C.B., G.C.M.G., G.C.V.O. (a Member of the House of Lords), and Sir FRANK SLY are called in; and Examined, as follows:—

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

744. You visited India by the wish of the Government to hold a double inquiry, did you not?—(Lord Southborough.) I did.

745. Your Report has since been commented upon by the Government of India. Would you like to make any statement with regard to either the means by which you arrived at your own conclusions, or any commentary on what the Government of India said with regard to them?—I should like to do both. I should like, with the permission of the Committee, to make a statement ment with regard to the more important points in the Franchise Report itself, and also to give the Committee information upon the criticisms made on the Franchise Report by the Government of India. The first I will attempt very imperfectly by making a statement; the second I would desire to meet with the assent of the Committee by putting in a Memorandum which has been very carefully prepared in answer to the criticisms of the Government of India, and which bears Sir Frank Sly's signature and my own. If I may say so, the convenience of dealing with the criticisms of the Government of India on the Report in that fashion, namely, by a written Memorandum, is that witnesses like myself who have had to deal with this matter from day to day will escape making any comment upon the criticisms of the Government of India except in careful and measured language. Shall I put in the Memorandum now?

746. We shall be very glad to have it. Is it too long for you to read?—No, I do not think it is, as a matter of fact, but in that case it would come after the statement on the Report.

747. Thank you. We will have the statement first?—I think, on reflection, that it would weary the Committee to read the Memorandum. I think perhaps between now and when I have finished my statement, or a little later, copies could be obtained perhaps from the India Office. It is in print, but I only have one copy.

748. The Secretary of State thinks there are copies in the India Office. In that case I am sure the clerk will get them for us. We will adjourn the Memorandum for the moment?—With regard to the Report itself, the Committee on Franchise opened its inquiry at Simla on the 8th November, 1918, and that Report was signed on the 22nd February, 1919. During the intervening period the Committee, hand in hand with the Functions Committee, as it is called, of which more will be said later by others, visited the various Provinces and Presidencies in India. Burma, as the Committee is aware, is not within our reference. We visited all the Provinces and Presidencies referred to in our reference except Assam, and the Assam case was taken by arrangement with the Assam Government at Calcutta. I only mention these facts just to bring out, if I may, to the Committee the line of conduct governing the inquiry. The Government of India, in the meantime, made arrangements with the Governments of the Presidencies and of the Provinces to secure that those in the Presidencies and Provinces who desired should have an opportunity of giving evidence before the Tribunal, and I think it is quite reasonable to say that we took care to hear all the evidence tendered, unless in individual cases here and there we found that a particular person desired to press a point which had already been fully considered by the Committee. At an early period, in fact on arrival in India, we ascertained that it was to be part of the programme of inquiry that in each of the Provinces the Committee should have put at its disposal local expert assistants, and in pursuance of that plan, wherever we went, we received excellent assistance from two added members, one an official and the other an Indian gentleman specially versed in the requirements of the particular Province. That, the Committee will observe, was a very important point, because by having communications with those local skilled assistants we were in many cases, before we entered the Province itself, put in special touch with the demands and requirements of the Province; that is, we did not go there strangers to the points which were likely to be thought of the greatest importance.

Then, again, as a means of really ascertaining and testing the mind of the local authorities, whenever our inquiry was finished by the taking of evidence, and so on, we sought and obtained, through the courtesy of the Governor or Lieutenant-Governor, an interview with him, and, where he had an Executive Council, with his Executive Government. The object of that move on our part was to be able to feel that before leaving the Province we had again, and finally, put ourselves in touch with the Administration, for the purpose of ascertaining whether, after we had heard the evidence, we could or could not make some arrangement with the Local Administration which would enable us to feel that in making our report on the evidence we were really taking the Local Administration in our train. In the large majority of cases we did succeed in working hand in hand with the Presidencial or Provincial Government, as the case may be.

Now, having said so much in regard to the method of laying out the inquiry, I would desire to direct the attention of the Joint Committee to the composition of the Franchise Committee itself, because its composition had, naturally, a very considerable part to play in endeavouring to solve the questions submitted to the Committee by the terms of reference. If you will be good enough to look at the composition of the Committee, you will see that it contained the names of two very important and experienced Indian Civil Servants, namely, Sir Frank Sly and Mr. Hailey: both men very well known indeed, men who had had knowledge of the higher administration of affairs in India. There was also Sahibzada Aftab Ahmed Khan, who is the Mohammedan member of the Secretary of State's Council; there was Babu Surendranath Banerjea, who is no doubt well known to members of the Committee; he is a very prominent and experienced Indian gentleman, versed in Indian politics in all their forms, and, beyond that, he is a member of the Legislative Assembly. The same observation applies to Mr. Sastri, who is a distinguished Brahmin. The other member of the Committee, Mr. Malcolm Hogg, is a merchant, and was at one time President of the Bombay Chamber of Commerce. With regard to Mr. Hogg, whose assistance to the Committee was most important, it would not be fair that I should suggest that he made the questions affecting the commercial communities of India, European and Indian, in any sense his own, but naturally his position in India, and his kowledge of the requiremets of that description made him most important to the Committee when it became our duty to consider the questions of commercial and European representation. Speaking generally, and over all, and treating myself as Chairman, if I may say so, rather as a judicial than a political officer, we had a Committee which represented every school of thought, a very dangerous thing in itself when you set to work to try to bring into agreement problems which are perhaps traditionally insoluble as regards this or that member of the Committee. We had two Hindoos, a Mohammedan, a European merchant and two distinguished Indian Civil Servants, and it was upon them the Chairman had to rely for worrying out the answers to the problems set by the Indian Government in the terms of reference. The duty of the Chairman was to try and discover as far as he could, having regard to the evidence and the general tenor of the inquiry, the via media which was likely to lead to the best solution during the experimental years of this great reform. I only desire to say in addition—I do not want to weary you—that the Committee took—I am speaking of my colleagues—a very high line from the beginning of their deliberations; they put aside querulous and carping criticism altogether, and they sat down with a determination to find a solution of those problems which were put to them. It could only have been done by great sacrifices on the part of one and of the other; in consequence of old associations with other things, and so on, they had to make great sacrifices, but they made them in order to obtain unanimity, and they got it.

749. Your final Report was unanimous?—The Report was signed by all the members of the Committee. There was no Minority Report, and there were no notes of dissent. The Constitutions which are scheduled to the Report are unanimous; but in the Report itself, here and there, a member of the Committee, myself included, while agreeing to the Constitutions because it was essential, in our view, that we should be unanimous, expressed the view that he would have preferred some different course had it been possible. That was the only measure of dissent which we found among ourselves through the whole time. Those points of qualification, I would rather call them, are disclosed in the text of the Report.

Now, turning to the Report itself, which I assume you have before you, I should like to point out that it was based upon the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, that that in answering the terms of reference we had to pay the closest attention to that Report, and were glad to do so, and that the terms of reference imposed on the Committee the obligation of finding the most liberal terms of franchise consistent with the condition of things in India at the present time. The difficulty of handling that problem confronted us at the very start. I think my colleagues would agree with me when I say that at the early conversations we had at Simla we were in great doubt as to how we should set to work to find a suitable number of electors for each of the Presidencies and Provinces in India. It was the most thorny problem we had to tackle, because we had no data. What was the widest franchise that we could properly recommend? What was the true number of electors we could properly recommend for any given Presidency or Provinces? When we were anxious on this score relief came to us from the action taken by the Local Governments respectively. Using the added members to whom I have referred at an earlier period, we, through the added members, put ourselves in communication, in some cases at any rate, with the Local Governments, and the Local Governments then put in their proposals for local government in their respective Provinces.

750. Local government or local franchise?—They put in a scheme which covered not only the franchise but the number of electors, and, in fact, anything else they desired, such as the numbers of the Council and who should be represented on it. A complete scheme was put in to use as a block to chip at. The Committee will find in the schedules to the report at page 103 the statements which were so put in by the Presidencies and the Provinces. I cannot express too strongly the relief the Committee experienced from the assistance given them by the proposals put forward on their own account by the Local Governments in India. They were not all satisfactory to us. It was inevitable that in one or two cases they could not be satisfactory, but taking them as a whole they gave us the necessary data upon which to found our inquiries. Taking some of them, they really gave us the material upon which we could make our report. I do not know whether I am wearying the Joint Committee with this, but I anticipated that the contents of clause 11 on page 5 of the report would offer matters of primary importance for the consideration of the Committee, namely, the total population and the total electors. That clause 11 also illustrates the point very well of the reservation which was made by one or other members of the Committee upon some very important subjects.

Now what I want to show the Joint Committee is this: that the Franchise Committee did not roam round India and set to work to invent electorates, to fix numbers of electors, and so on, according to their own sweet will; or perhaps one might put it in another way and say, rashly. Take Assam, which was at the bottom of the list; the total population is 6,000,000, and the number of electors is 300,000.

751. That is the largest proportion of any, is it not?—Curiously enough that is the largest proportion of any. I thank your Lordship for making the observation, because I would like to bring out a point upon that. When we got to close quarters with the Local Governments, and they made their proposals as to the number of electors, we felt it to be our duty, as far as we could, not to quarrel with their proposals, subject to this very important point, that we said to them: "If you propose such a number of electors as that, do we understand that you, the Government, pledge yourselves to be able to poll the electors and to honestly and bona fide carry out the election?" When the answer was in the affirmative we endeavoured to accept the proposals made by the Local Government, because we thought that upon the evidence we got they were the people who really ought to know their business best. Take Assam, which is, as I say, the smallest in population of the lot; there, at page 276 of the report, the Joint Committee will see that at one of the meetings to which I have referred at an earlier period of my statement, namely, the meetings that we always had with the Local Governments before we parted with them, the Chief Commissioner, as a condition, apparently, of entering into a discussion with us, and prior to making an agreement with us upon the franchise and upon the scheme of local government, said to me, "I wish to know, in the first place, whether my proposal for 300,000 electors is accepted," and I said it was. I only mention that because it shows that we did not go to Assam and say, "Oh, 300,000 is a nice round number; let us put it down on paper and propose it." Then you go to the Central Provinces with a population of over 12½ millions and 159,500 electors—about 160,000. There we acted in practical accord with the Administrator of that Province. Then Bihar and Orissa has a population of 32,446,000 odd and 576,000 electors. Those figures, I think I am right in saying, were, in fact, put forward by the Governor of Bihar and Orissa and accepted by us for that reason. In the case of Bihar and Orissa you will observe on page 5 that Mr. Hailey entered one of those minutes of reservation to which reference has been made. He asked that the franchise should be raised. You will see it in the middle of page 5. If you look at page 238, again at the proceedings which took place between myself and my colleagues and the Government of Bihar and Orissa, at the top of the page, Mr. Hailey made a proposal to raise the franchise in order to reduce the size of the Electorate. "His Honour"—that is the Lieutenant Governor—"said that the Local Government were satisfied that the necessary electoral machinery was available. If power was to be transferred to the people all classes should be represented. If the franchise was pitched higher only the landlords and tenure-holders would be included. He thought that in the constituencies proposed by the Local Government the great majority of the voters would be literate. They would all be men in comfortable circumstances, and probably every one of them would send his sons to school. The proposed Electorates only represented 1.7 of the total population. Mr. Banerjea pointed out that the percentages proposed in the United Provinces was 3.5. His Honour pointed out that there was a widely spread revenue agency in the United Provinces which did not exist in Bihar and Orissa, and that uniformity between the Provinces could not be expected." Again, I say that I only desire to make the point to show that these figures were not our own; they were based upon the schemes put in by the Local Governments and supported by the local Governors at our meetings with them.

I do not want to weary the Committee with all of them. The Punjab presented some different aspects, and if Sahibzada Aftab Ahmed Khan gives evidence before this Committee he will no doubt refer to what he said, or we said for him, on page 3 of the Report, namely, in his case he wanted to lower the franchse in the Punjab That was resisted by Sir Michael O'Dwyer at the same sort of meeting to which I have referred several times, and the Committee accepted the Lieutenant Governor's recommendation.

With regard to Bengal, I am afraid to say it is the most important part of India because one would get into trouble, but it is a very important part of India, with a population of 45 million, and the proposed electorate is 1,228,000.

752. That is relatively the smallest proportion?—Yes, pretty well. Now, the Bengal scheme was put forward by the able Government presided over by Lord Ronaldshay, who gave us great assistance all through our heavy labours in Bengal. The able Government I referred to put in a scheme for Bengal which, speaking almost by the card, was virtually accepted en bloc by the Committee. I will read you the criticism by Lord Ronaldshay on page 168. It is a very good scheme and a very satisfactory scheme to the members of my Committee, who are familiar with these things, and we really, I think I may say without fear of contradiction, took it as it stood, subject, of course, to all those variations of figures and estimates, and so on, which did not involve principle. At page 168 "His Excellency," that is Lord Ronaldshay, "said that the Local Government were unanimous in thinking that in the circumstances of Bengal the franchise should be as wide as possible, provided that arrangements could be made to poll the votes." That, again, was in answer, as you see, to a suggestion by Mr. Hailey that the number of electors should be reduced. Of course, the Bengal Government, in putting forward the scheme, did undertake to poll the votes, and if they had not made up their minds that they could poll the votes, I do not suppose the Government would have unanimously put forward the scheme. I have tried to make my point, which is simply that for our operations in that direction we relied on local support and adopted it where we could.

But now unfortunately we have to come to the case of Madras, where for various reasons, of which, I think, the Committee are aware, we did not make an agreement with the Madras Government. The difficulty we had with the Madras Government as to franchise and the number of electors was not a self-contained difficulty, that is, I am not sure that we could not have made an arrangement with the Madras Government as to the number of electors and the franchise if there had not been overlying difficulties surrounding us, the principal of which, as the Joint Committee know, was the quarrel as to communal representation for the purpose of putting a check to the preponderance of power alleged to be in the Brahmin community. But all the same, so far as this particular point is concerned, and apart from the communal question in Madras, we had no grave disagreement upon numbers with the Madras Government. We met them, as we met every other Government, in a friendly way, and we proposed certain alterations to them in numbers which, I think I may say, they accepted, but accepted unwillingly. As a matter of fact, if you bear in mind what I have tried to say to you about the other Provinces and the numbers of electors, and the agreements at which we arrived, and the percentages presented by the number of electors to the population, the Madras Government proposed to enfranchise about 0.8 of the population, as against 1 per cent. or 2 per cent., or a little more, in the other Provinces. That was the position we had to tackle with them, quite apart from the communal difficulty. And we did succeed, at least I hope we succeeded. I could not point to any assent on the part of the Government of Madras, but I think the dissent of the Government of Madras, when we concluded our labours with them, remained on the communal question, and not with regard to the electorate.

Lord Islington.] May I ask Lord Southborough to elaborate that point?

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).] By all means.

Lord Islington.

753. (To the Witness.) Can you give us the grounds upon which the Government of Madras put forward such a very disproportionate electorate as compared with the other Provinces?—I think that the Government of Madras was really unwilling to embark on a reform scheme on these lines, the lines of the Franchise Report, at all, until they were satisfied that their objections as regards certain parts of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report were removed. But, as I say, the communal question in Madras played the important hand, as far as we were concerned.

754. In producing this very small percentage?—In the general position of reluctance. I do not propose to trouble you any further with regard to the figures. I am afraid I have laboured it a good deal, but I have seen so many criticisms, and I heard criticisms in the House of Lords upon the concoction of these electorates, and I only wanted to show that nothing wild and foolish had been done by the Committee, but they had really set to work to endeavour to get light and leading from the people who will be affected in future by these things, namely, the Local Governments. They got the light and leading, and they adopted it with a reservation with regard to smaller things.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).] You have made it quite clear to the Committee how you have arrived at a very difficult conclusion. No doubt some members will wish to cross-examine you presently upon it.

Sir Henry Craik.

755. Is the estimate of the Government of Madras that contained on page 120?—That was their estimate.

756. A half of what you have on page 5?—Yes; I should think that is a very fair way of stating it. As I am reminded, we raised the number of voters there from 0.8 to 1.3.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

757. You raised it?—Yes. This was a case in which we said to ourselves, "Coming down from Bengal, and with the Bengal scheme before us, we find in this Presidency nothing approaching the figure which other people—Bengal, for instance—have thought quite a reasonable one." And so we discussed it with the Governor. I should say the evidence that we got from the outside people was all in favour of increasing the figures; but what we wanted to know was how far we could carry the Government with us, and how far the Government could say they could poll the electors if they got them. That was our difficulty. I tell you quite frankly and quite honestly that I could not point to anything to show in writing or in print that the Madras Government ever said that it was enamoured of the larger figure; but the impression which was left on my mind—and you will have an opportunity of asking some of my colleagues—was this, that the quarrel—as far as there was a quarrel with them—was not upon the question of figures at all, it was a question of principles, and the principles were the principles of communal representation, and so forth.

758. Do you wish to say anything more on the question of communal representation?—Yes; I am afraid I must. That is, I want to say something more on the subject of Madras Communal Representation. I did not propose to say anything about communal representation of other sorts in other places, so far as I am concerned; but the Madras question is one of those things where the onus is still left upon us.

The question of the non-Brahmins of Madras is referred to in paragraph 20 of page 8 of the Report. As a detailed question, as distinct from an all-overriding difficulty, it was the most awkward thing we had to deal with. It was really a question peculiar to Madras. We did not hear much of it—I think I may say more closely that we did not hear anything of it—I am speaking of the Brahmin question—anywhere else in India except lightly in Bombay, during the inquiry in Bombay; but so far as Madras is concerned it was a very awkward and very difficult and a very pressing question, because without tackling it vigorously and trying to make the various sections of the community come into some agreement, we could not do what I hope we did in the other Presidencies and Provinces, arrange a constitution for the coming years, the experimental years, practically satisfactory to the community, as witnessed by their Governments. If the Committee will look at paragraph 20, which cost the Committee a great deal of labour and thought, you will see the position in which we were placed and how we endeavoured to meet it. There was a distinguished leader of Madras thought, Dr. Nair, whose death I much regretted to read of in the papers a few days ago, who felt so strongly upon a part of this subject that we did not succeed in inducing him and his friends to come and give evidence before the Committee. I should have said from what I heard of him that he was a remarkable politician and a good organiser, but he was not prepared to throw the weight of his influence into the form of evidence, and come before us. The reason expressed for his refusal was an objection to the composition of the Committee. You will observe that that is a question which it was impossible for the Committee itself to try. The Committee had been appointed by the Government of India and was going its round of the Provinces under the directions of the Government of India, and it was quite impossible for us at that late hour to give attention to a plea that Dr. Nair and his friends would have been prepared to come before us if the Committee had been in part composed of other people. Now what was the effect of their staying away? The effect of their staying away was that we had not the advantage of hearing from them, or even from the subsidiary people connected with them, their objections, or rather their petitions, in favour of an extraordinary course, the extraordinary course being that a very very large population should receive protection from the tyranny of a small population. We are all quite familiar with communal representation and its objects, and I apprehend that the majority of the members of the Joint Committee are not enamoured of communal representation at all; but this proposition was quite a different one from those we have come across in other parts of the world. Here you have got a very large population of

of a mixed character, different castes, asking that in a new constitution they should have their own constituencies, that they should have protection from any interference by the Brahmins, that, in fact—because it came to this, as we understood it—the Brahmins were to be excluded from any opportunity of bringing pressure to bear upon this great majority of the population by introducing candidates who were not Brahmins, because it was feared that a non-Brahmin candidate, if there was a Brahmin about, would be influenced by the Brahmin. I cannot put it to you as well as those who are more conversant with the grievance can, but as you will see from our Clause in the Report it really amounted to this: that the people who were asking for the protection, and who would appear on the voters' list—not population, but voters' list—would outnumber the others by four to one. I may be right, or it may be wrong, it may be good or bad, but the Committee will observe that in consequence of the action of the great exponents of the policy of communal representation—in this case by the refusal of Dr. Nair and his friends to come before us—we were really robbed of the best—in fact the only—evidence which we could get in support of a very extraordinary claim. Now what was our duty in that case? Was it our duty to depart from ordinaty constitutional principles in preparing a scheme for Madras, or was it our duty, recollecting, for instance, how we had fared in Bengal, where we had made an agreement with the Bengal Government, was it our duty to say, "We must, under these circumstances, put forward a free, just and full scheme for Madras on the lines of Bengal, or any other Province or Presidency of the same kind, and let that stand until it is proved beyond dispute that those who are in favour of this extraordinary course, or are in favour of something short of the whole plea for communal representation, come forward, justify it, and say that they will take it and accept it as a final settlement of the grievance?" We had no such evidence; we had no such evidence at all. No one came to us and said with authority: "If we have this large and peculiar system of protecton of four votes versus one we will be content, and we will let the whole thing rest and go to sleep, and do the best we can under the new constitution." We had no one who came along and made the proposition—a proposition which had not been made to us in other parts of India, speaking generally—that "If in constituences of, say, seven or nine members the non-Brahmins would have secured to them the great majority of seats"—seven out of nine, if you like, and the Brahmins with two, or something of that sort—"we will accept that as a fair and just settlement, and try to work the constitution;" there was nothing at all of the kind. So I took upon myself to say, and my colleagues agreed with me, that our course was plain—that is, to draw for Madras a constitution in the ordinary form and leave the onus to lie heavily upon those who want to vary it in this very peculiar manner. If the Committee will look at the last paragraph of paragraph 20 on page 10, they will see the final line of thought taken by the Committee on this subject. I say the onus lies very heavily upon our friends the non-Brahmins to justify this exceptional treatment. It also lies upon them, if they are to have this very extraordinary form of constitution, to come forward and say they take it, and they will stand by it, and they will work it. We thought, as you will see in the last paragraph of paragraph 20, that the proper course was to recommend His Majesty's Government, through the Indian Government, to accept the form of constitution which we prepared in consultation with the Madras Government, they being unwilling, and scheduled to this report with the unanimous assent of my Committee, giving the exponents of this particular form of communal representation an opportunty of coming forward at a later date, but before the elections are held, preferably to the Government of India and not here, justifying their claim to some treatment which will meet their wishes—preferably again, I should have said, a reservation of seats to them in constituencies of 7 to 9 members. But the point I desire to make to the Joint Committee is this, that we were unanimous in feeling that we were not justified in embarking on a peculiar and extravagant form of constitution upon the evidence which was produced before us. We thought, and I still think, that the onus lies heavily upon the non-Brahmins to make out their case, and as far as I am concerned if I had anything to do with it, which I am glad to say I have not, I should not even then accept the proposition put forward by the non-Brahmins unless they made it a condition of settlement. Putting it in another way it is only justified as a condition of settling this question in such a way that during the 10 years or what-not of the new constitution they do their best to make it work.

759. There is no other case in your recommendations in which a community which is in a majority has been given a separate representation, is there?—No.

760. Or a special representation?—No. I want to be quite sure that there is no misunderstanding about it. You mean the majority of voters?

761. Yes?—Then my answer is, No.

762. Your point is that this community, the non-Brahmins, are in a large majority?—Yes, in a very large majority.

763. 4 to 1?—Yes.

764. 22 to 1 of population and 4 to 1 of representation?—Yes, that is right. It is a very novel proposition.

Lord Islington.

765. I suppose, though you had not the advantage of hearing the non-Brahmin community, you were able to elicit during your time in Madras, in conversation, the factors, other than that of majorities, which guided the decisions of non-Brahmins in their claim?—You mean by meeting prominent men and so on?

766. Yes?—Oh, yes.

767. You were able fully to familiarise yourself with the whole controversy and what lay beneath the controversy?—Well, I would be very sorry to say that. I was extraordinarily puzzled by the whole business, and I always felt that a great deal lay below the surface which you could not listen to in an after-dinner conversation except for the purpose of informing your mind.

Sir J. D. Rees.

768. Were not your two local members and more than half your witnesses non-Brahmins?—I have counted them up now?—True, certainly; but you must not assume that they all took what we believe was the Dr. Nair line.

Major Ormsby-Gore.

769. Are we to draw from what you said just now that the Government of Madras were inclined to take the Dr. Nair line when you arrived? When you arrived they were unwilling to submit figures in any way parallel to the Bengal figures, because they appeared, at any rate on the surface, to share Dr. Nair's opinion on communal representation. Did I understand you aright on that point?—I would like to say in answer that as far as I could gather from the conversations, I mean official conversations, with the Government of Madras, their inclination was in favour of a system of communal representation.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

770. I think we will not go on examining now, but we will let Lord Southborough finish his statement?—I am reminded that there is the question of women suffrage. I was a Steward of a Women's Suffrage Ball as far back as 1880, but I found great difficulty in applying those early proclivities of mind to this problem. The fact of the matter is this: We had to consider in Committee at a very early date what line we should take with regard to women's suffrage, because if the Committee had evidences of opinion in favour of women's suffrage, if the majority had shown a disposition to sign a report recommending women's suffrage, we should have had from the very beginning, you will observe, to consider our electoral rolls and our franchise and everything else of that sort from a different standpoint. I pointed out to my colleagues quite early that we must have a discussion upon the subject, and, without making up our minds, arrive at such a prima facie exchange of views as would make us understand whether, as we went from place to place, we must be prepared to give the women a vote, or whether e should go on on the basis of excluding the women. I am bound to say that there was no chance whatever of our seeing our way to recommend women's suffrage for the women of India during this early stage. You have the Committee, with its curious divergencies of thought and religion and so on, unanimous on that score with the exception of the dictum of my friend Mr. Hogg, who said that "While there may be no very general demand for female suffrage at present, no strong opposition to it was revealed by the evidence, and therefore it is advisable to remove the sex disqualification at the outset of the development of responsible Government in India. He would not, however, be in favour of making any special or separate arrangements for the recording of women's votes."

Now that, if I may say so, appealed to me as a very fair diagnosis of a great deal of the evidence we received in India. The people who came before us, many of them, were individually in favour of applying women's suffrage. I am bound to say that as a man not conversant with such things or any other important question of the kind in India, I was very much astonished at the evidence that we did receive. But I could not help feeling all the time I listened to the evidence, which was given by really prominent and good men, that their object was to do something to improve the political position of the women, that is, by marking the fact in the Act which may pass as a result of these proceedings that women were being advanced in India by being given the vote, and that they were not thinking at all of whether the women would be able to use the vote, whether they would desire to use the vote, and whether it would not to some extent outrage the old conservative feeling in India if they were given the vote. I do not know whether I make the point plain. To my mind the idea was that it would be a graceful thing and a helpful thing to give women the vote, because it would be pointed to here, and in other parts of the world, as evidence of a direct desire to give them assistance towards larger measures of emancipation. That seemed to be the point of the evidence. But when you came to discuss with the witnesses the practical use of the vote, how they were going to start out and use it, whether they were going to break their purdah, and all that kind of thing, they said: "Oh, a great many of them will not vote, you know, but still, it will be such a good educational thing for them to have the vote." My colleagues, including my Indian friends—certainly including two of my Indian friends on the Committee—I think sympathised in the abstract with the desire to help the women by giving them the vote, but, as you will obsesrve from the report and the signatures, they did not come up to the scratch, they did not go beyond the point of sympathy, and express themselves in favour of giving the vote, with the exception of Mr. Hogg, who said: "It would be a very good thing if the ladies had the vote, but I am not prepared to make any special or separate arrangements for the recording of the vote." That reservation. as everybody on the Joint Committee knows who is at all acquainted with the subject, robs the gift of all its merit, because unless Parliament is going to say that the women are to be sought out by, we will say, women voting officers in their own homes, and so on, except in the case of those who are prepared in the advance as time goes on to break their purdah, they would be excluded from the privilege which it was intended to give. So, for that reason, neither my Indian friends nor my Civil Service colleagues saw their way to make the recommendation at the present time. But if the Committee will kindly read our report they will see that we were not frivolous at all upon the subject. As far as I am concerned I was much more impressed with the question as a practical question than I ever deemed imaginable, and I can quite conceive that, as the next few years go by, assuming that Parliament gives effect to these proposals, or anything like them, this question will be brought up again for a certainty at the end of the decade, and will be judged by the social condition of the Indian lady at that time.

Lord Islington.

771. Have you examined the questioon so far as to find out an estimate as to the increase of the electorate if women were admitted?—Speaking from recollection, the evidence we had was to the effect that the increase would be small, and that even when small would be made smaller still by the difficulties which would arise as to the giving of the votes, which you will observe only brings us back again to the old point, namely, that the vote was a good and gracious thing to be given, but would not, in these days and in these conditions, be of much practical effect.

Sir J. D. Rees.

772. Did you examine any women?—We had the evidence of two or three ladies, yes.

773. Do you think an Indian lady should be examined here by this Committee?—That is not for me to say at all.

Mr. Bennett.

774. You say that the question of the women's vote had to be settled early. That does not imply that anything like inadequate consideration was given to the question. You heard an adequate number of witnesses on the subject before settling it?—Yes, we debated the question at every inquiry, and I am sure we heard evidence at every inquiry in every Presidency.

775. May I take it that the desire to which you referred to give women the vote aimed at improvement in their status rather than anything else?—That is what I felt.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Middleton).

776. What point would you like to take next?—I do not desire to trouble the Committee with any further statement. I have said a great deal too much, I am afraid, and I would now put in the Memorandum to which I referred, containing our observations upon the criticisms of the Government of India. (The Statement is handed in.)

777. I think the best plan would be that we should all read your Memorandum and then address questions to you on it; but at present, if you do not wish to give us any further evidence, we will proceed to cross-examine you on what you have been good enough to tell us?—If I may make a suggestion, the Memorandum you have before you was prepared by Sir Frank Sly and myself, and as he is coming as a substantive witness before you you might see fit to ask him the questions on that part.

Mr. Montagu.] I would suggest that the Memorandum ought to be read together with the summary which has already been circulated to the Committee of the points of difference between the Franchise Committee and the Government of India. If the members of the Committee would read those two documents together they would be in a better position at some subsequent sitting to cross-examine Sir Frank Sly on them.

Lord Islington.] I think we should leave the Memorandum to a subsequent examination of Sir Frank Sly.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).] That is the course I suggested. We have a great deal of material before us, and if we could get through a good deal of our examination on this point to-day, we might ask Lord Southborough to come back again on Monday, when we have had an opportunity of reading the Memorandum.

Lord Sinha.

778. Am I right in saying that the general picture of the rural voter under your scheme is that of a substantial well-to-do peasant?—That was the picture painted for us in evidence, including the evidence of several of the Lieutenant-Governors.

779. All the Local Governments insisted that the qualification for a vote should be that of a stake in the country, a substantial person, whether literate or illiterate?—That was so.

780. And I think in your notes it appears practically in all the Provinces that that is the picture which the Local Government presents?—Yes.

781. I

781. I am saying that because I think in the Government of India's Despatch they say they are unable to form a picture of the voter, but the picture is there?—Yes. I am afraid I formed a very inadequate picture of the voter as an individual; but what I say in answer to your Lordship is this, that the Committee over which I presided was quite capable of forming a very accurate notion of the voter, seeing they had all of them lived among such people all their lives.

782. And so were the Local Governments, I suppose?—So were the Local Governments.

783. There is one question which I think is not dealt with in your Memorandum, that is, the dispatch of the Government of India—I do not know whether you have seen it—on the question of Grand Committee?—I read something of it in the newspaper.

784. I should like to ask you a question with regard to that arising out of your Report. In paragraph 25 of your Report, on page 11, you say: "In our recommendations regarding official seats we have been guided entirely by the necessity of providing the number of officials required for constituting the Grand Committee in accordance with paragraph 232 of the Joint Report. We have assumed that the standard strength of the Grand Committee will be forty per cent. of the Council," and then you add that probably it would be more convenient if it were reduced to thirty?—Yes.

785. That relates to the recommendation as to the number of officials in the Legislative Council itself?—Yes.

786. Was there any proposal put before you by the Government of India as to the basis upon which they now want to proceed for the Grand Committee?—Not before the Franchise Committee; I cannot answer for the Functions Committee.

787. It is important, is it not, that the Grand Committee should be fairly representative of the different interests represented in the Legislative Council?—I should have thought very much so.

788. And that it would be hardly a correct basis to take the number of officials you have available and to proceed to form your Grand Committee on that—to regulate the number according to the number of officials you have. Would that be a correct basis if you want to make it representative?—I think it would be an unfortunate basis. I do not profess to be very deep in the thing, but it seems to me to be a perfectly sound view that a Governor would not be doing his duty diplomatically, to say the least of it, if he embarked on legislation and tried to press it without being sure or without reasonable certainty of being able to poll a small minority of the elected representatives.

789. There is another question which you have not touched upon to-day in your statement about Mohammedan representation. I think you have proceeded upon what is called the Lucknow Pact, the Congress League agreement, with regard to Mohammedan representation in all the bodies?—Yes.

790. Am I correct in saying that that agreement must be taken as a whole, and refers to Mohammedan representation in all Provinces, that is, one Province giving up something in order that another Province might have a little more?—Yes. As your Lordship knows far better than I do, the question of how to arrange for such a purpose as ours, I mean my colleagues and my own, the future of the Mohammedan and the Hindoo, presented an almost terrifying prospect. If it had not been that some concordat had been arrived at between these great sections of the community themselves, I am not quite sure that our Committee could have lived to the end. It was perfectly plain at an early date that we had to make up our minds not to slavishly follow any such arrangement, but to use the arrangements as a guide, and, using it as a guide, test it by evidence as we went along, and that we did.

791. I think you have said in the printed document put in to-day that to disturb it with regard to one Province would have the effect of disturbing it as a whole?—With all respect to the Government of India, it seemed to be a most extraordinary proposition that in Bengal, of all places in the world, where we had arrived at a settlement of all these component parts of this jig-saw puzzle by arrangement, they should want to pick out something or other which would bring the whole thing to pieces on the table.

792. Was there much evidence in Bengal against the agreement? Well, we certainly had one or two important witnesses, but Mr. Aftub would discuss that much better with you than I can.

793. I want to ask you one question with regard to the Council of State. Is it possible, in your view, to have a senatorial franchise so as to make it a purely senatorial body over the whole of India?—I can only answer that by saying that after five months' deliberation we could not get near it, and if it had not been for the self-denial of my Indian colleagues we should have come to grief on those sort of questions, because they involved all sorts of the most dangerous considerations. We had to make up our minds that the proper thing to do was to set this machine going, and let it run on conservative lines during the early years. Of course, they would have liked direct representation if they could have got a real downright democratic representation to both these assemblies at the top. They could not have that. I mean I could not have put my signature to such a thing as that in India to-day; they have got to make a beginning. It is quite enough beginning for them to arrange their electoral rolls and have their Legislative Councils, and to make them run and work properly. The rest will be added to them some day.

794. May I take it shortly that the recommendations of your Report are the results of a series of mutual give-and-takes, without which it would have been impossible to come to any conclusion?—Most decidedly. I am sorry that the Government of India are not pleased that we were able to find a via media through these difficulties by consent.

Lord Islington.

795. You told us that you practically, in matters of detail in regard to these different electorates in the Provinces, left that detail to the Local Governments, and accepted, in large measure, the detail which went towards forming their recommendations?—No. Forgive me if I am wrong, but what I intended to say was this, that at these consulations with the Governments we settled the principles, but the details remained unsettled in some cases. I was guarding myself against being told that I put it too high when I said that we arranged, for instance, with Bengal a scheme. There were bound to be at the end of the inquiry a lot of figures, for instance, which must be re-adjusted with local knowledge, questions of cutting up the administrative districts in one form or another. It is suggested to me that the question has another bearing. The original proposals in detail of the Local Governments were often altered by us after our communications with them. I do not know whether that was the point you wanted to get at.

796. Yes; that generally. For instance, I understand that each Province has varying qualifications?—Oh, yes.

797. And having examined and cross-examined the Local Governments, you were satisfied with those respective qualifications in each Province?—Yes; I thought we could not do better than listen to them on the subject, and the Committee was not dismayed by differentiations between one Province and another; they thought that, at the beginning of a movement of this importance, it was just as well that the Local Governments should try dissimilar schemes. As time goes on, and the matter comes under review, alterations can be made, if there is anything wrong.

798. For instance, take the case of Assam, which is not so advanced a Province as others, you have a higher proportion there to the population?—Yes.

799. That has been brought about, I take it, by a considerably lower qualification?—Well, it was brought about, really, by the Chief Commissioner desiring that his people should have a voting list of 300,000. We accepted it. I referred you to the page.

800. And in order to get his 300,000—though it is rather a backward Province—he had to dip down rather lower in qualification than was the case in other Provinces?—I think the conditions are very different: but, but, as I said before, we were guided by him. There are a good many people engaged in industry there. There is some mining, and so on.

Lord Sinha.

801. You have wage-earners there earning more than the peasant?—That was what I was trying to put. I was trying to put that into a form of words. The industry there, I wanted to say, was different, and might be more remunerative in wages than elsewhere.

Lord Islington.

802. Did you go, in the course of your examination with Local Governments, in any detail into the physical methods by which elections will be carried out?—Yes; it really was the all-important point to some of us: Given those electorates, can you manage them; and we never neglected, as I have endeavoured to show in my statement, pressing upon the Presidential and Provincial Governments the necessity of telling us that they were quite sure that they could manage the thing they proposed. And the answer (except in the case of Madras, where it was negative, and not positive—or, rather, where we got no answer at all; but I hope they did not mean they could not manage it) was in the affirmative, and strongly in the affirmative. Take a specimen case. They proposed to stick to the usual administrative district, and then to carve it up into constituencies of what they conceived to be a manageable size, and then to employ both their own Civil Service List and additional aid, which they assured us could be obtained, for the purpose of managing the elections and polling the voters. I cannot say that I can put it any higher than that. The Government said they could do it and we accepted it.

803. Did you get any further information from them as to how they were going to carry out an election such as that which is described by the Government of India? I suppose it is rather an extreme case, the case of Bakargunj?—Yes.

804. The letter from the Government of India of April 23rd, 1919, says at the end of paragraph 9: "We cannot seriously conceive it as a physical possibility, to take two of the Committee's examples, that 122,000 voters could be polled in the district of Bakargunj, almost entirely devoid of roads and traversed in all directions by vast rivers"?—If you look at the Memorandum which we have just put in under the second head of my evidence, paragraph 8, you will see we tackle that question. "The Government of India under-estimate the amount of non-official asistance that will be available. In every Province the Committee took special care to ascertain that the Local Government would be able to conduct an election with the proposed electorate. Our proposals contemplate that the election should be completed in each constituency in a single day, but not in all constituencies in the Province on the same day, so that it may be possible to employ some peripatetic staff. Thus, the total electorate of 122,000 voters in Bakargunj district (Bengal) will be divided into five single member constituencies, which may be polled separately on different days." The Government of India had not looked closely at that you see. "And the Local Government informed us that in this district the number of voters had been largely over-estimated. As regards Almora (United Provinces), with its 96,000 voters, this includes Mohammedans, who will be polled separately, and in this particular instance the Committee decreased the size of the constituency first recommended by the Local Government. This proposed constituency was specially discussed with the Local Government, who informed us that it could not be conveniently divided, and that the necessary electoral machinery could be provided. There are advantages as well as disadvantages in variations of standard between Province and Province, for they will provide most useful experience when the scheme next comes under review." So you will observe we had to consider there whether we should stand to our recommendation in the Report under the criticism of the Government of India, or stand by the recommendations that had been made to us by the Local Government, and we chose the latter.

805. Then, of course, as regards the sufficiency of staff for conducting elections, I suppose in each case you went into that?—We made that a subject of evidence in each case.

806. Will the Local Government be responsible for the conduct of an election?—I apprehend certainly. They will have to make rules under the supreme authority, whatever it is, and become responsible in that way both for the election and for enforcing what we should call here the Corrupt Practices Act.

807. Did you go into the question of under which Minister the conduct of elections would be, or as to whether it would come under the head of a reserved service or a transferred?—No, we did not; but, of course, we dealt with the Government as a whole. We have to deal with the Government as we find it to-day. I do not think that we should have got any expression of opinion from them as to how the business would be parcelled out under the new form of Government.

808. Do you happen to know whether there are any set of recommendations either from the Government of India or through the Government of India from the Local Governments in regard to the administration of elections, and how they are to be conducted, to which we could have access?—I do not know myself.

809. Or as to whether it has had serious consideration by any of the administrations?—You mean for the elections under the new scheme?

810. When the election is set going, assuming the Bill is passed and becomes an Act, and the whole machinery of election has to be set in motion?—I can say this, that certainly some of the Local Governments have paid great attention to the question of getting rules and regulations and all the rest of it ready to see how the thing looks, and how it is going to pan out; but I do not know what the Government of India has done on the subject.

811. I think you said just now that on the Mohammedan question, in Bengal, you came to a satisfactory settlement by general consent?—With the Bengal Government, yes, certainly.

812. And you gathered from the Bengal Government that on the whole you would meet with satisfaction in the Presidency?—Oh, yes. I referred to Lord Ronaldshay's observations on the subject earlier in the morning. They not only would have answered your question in the affirmative, as I think, but they resist, as you observe, any alteration of their scheme.

813. Now one word as regards the Madras situation. I think you said that you lay great stress on whatever arrangement is come to being accepted by the non-Brahmin representatives of the community. It would take the form of a settlement?—Yes, I think the onus lies on the non-Brahmin community to formulate their proposals at the proper time and in the proper place, to make themselves responsible for them, and to say, "These being our proposals, we shall do our best to make them work, and live happily ever afterwards."

814. Assuming you could obtain that, would you say on the whole that the counter-proposal of the Government of India would satisfactorily meet the situation of 30 and 61—I think that is what they proposed?—Speaking generally, if you take it from me generally, that is the kind of thing.

815. One word as regards the Central Government. You said that the only form of electorates for the two Assemblies of the Central Parliament that you can arrive at by agreement was that which you recommend, owing to the great difficulties and differences of opinion?—I am afraid I must say we should have had serious disagreement if we had endeavoured to elaborate any form of our own. So far as the evidence was concerned, we got very little help. We had to rely to a great extent on the flat proposals of the Local Governments in favour of what we recommended, with the exception, I think, of Bihar and Orissa, who at first were disposed to toy with another system, unstated, but which would have meant direct election, and then withdrew it.

816. In view of the comparatively brief time that you had at your disposal, and also in view of the extremely onerous work that you had to discharge, do you feel yourself that you had an adequacy of time to give full consideration to this erection of a Central Government electorate?—Yes. We were not driven.

As I said earlier in my statement, I do not think we ever rejected a witness who could show that he was coming forward with new and important matter.

817. I suppose you feel that it is not an ideal constitution which is composed of identical electorates for both Houses?—I entirely agree. But then, fortunately for His Majesty's Government, they are not embarking on a Washington constitution or a South African constitution; they are embarking on the policy of doing the best they can to arrive at a conclusion which will represent the Washington or South African constitution in years to come.

Sir J. D. Rees.

818. Looking at the table of electors, Madras with nearly 40 millions of population has slightly over half a million electors, while Bombay, with half the population, has 100,000 more electors, and Bengal and the United Provinces, with rather more population than Madras, have three times the number of electors. Is that disparity entirely due to the Madras Government? Does that reflect their attitude?—I went through the figures to some extent, rather anticipating questions on this head. I endeavoured to show that in the cases to which I referred, and I will include Bombay in that for this purpose, we paid great attention to the proposals of the Presidencies and the Local Governments. I think in the case of Bombay we did put some pressure upon His Excellency the Governor in Council to increase the number of electors. But it was done anyhow with assent. With regard to Madras, Madras was the only case in which the figures presented the peculiar disparity I have described, and that, as I think, was not really because the Madras Government felt great difficulty in handling the electorate, but because of the other and important side-questions which governed the situation.

819. Would you say that that, comparatively, very small figure of electors for Madras would argue to anybody that there was a backwardness on the part of the Province or on the part of its Government? Is it not the case as regards the others which have a comparatively small electorate that they are comparatively backward Provinces?—As you ask me the question I will tell you quite frankly I was sorry at the attitude which was taken up by Madras with regard to the whole of this question, not merely the voting business and the number of electors, but generally. No one could say that Madras was a backward country.

820. No, indeed?—It is an enormous and an attractive and a very beautiful country. What really affected me as a novice and as a traveller, to a great extent, was to find that the people of Madras, either in themselves or as governed by those in authority, or both, did not appear to me to be doing all that they should to put Madras in the position she ought to occupy vis-à-vis Bombay, Bengal and the other Provinces.

821. Are you aware that this result is a matter of regret to those who are interested in Madras, to a Madras Civil Servant for instance, like myself, who has had the bureaucratic instinct, more or less, brayed out of him in the House of Commons? You agree with me in thinking it is unfortunate and prejudices the position of Madras under the new dispensation?—That is what I say.

822. You do not accept the statement that it solely depends upon their inability to organise an election, because that is what it amounts to?—It is incredible. You have got Bengal and Madras lying side by side, each with an enormous population; the Government of Bengal comes along and says to us of their own motion, without pressure, "We can manage 1,228,000 electors," and Madras comes along and says—if she does say—I do not say she says it because I tried to put it very clearly to you all along, she did not say she could not, but she implies that she cannot, manage 542,000.

823. You referred to objections made by the Madras Government to parts of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report. Is not the chief objection around which the others centre their objections, the transfer of subjects to Ministers, and, in point of fact, to the appointment of Ministers, too? Does not it centre around that?—Oh, yes.

824. That is the chief ground?—It was the chief ground. Of course, they did put in schemes, but at one time they did not want to have any scheme at all.

825. Does not that bring one to the caste question? That question again is governed by the caste question to which you have referred in Madras. I want to ask you as to the objections made in Madras, the cause of that indisposition to accept these reforms, to which you have made several references. Do not they hold that it would be a transfer of these subjects of administration, not to the new Ministers, but to a Brahmin oligarchy, not to the people of India, but to a high-class oligarchy?—You mean the non-Brahmins?

826. Yes. Is not that how the case occurs to you that was put to you in Madras?—I think so, yes. The Brahmin in Madras is like King Charles' head to a certain well-known person; he cropped up everywhere in every question.

827. Do you, as an impartial traveller, investigating this matter in India, find any justification in any quarter for the suggestion, or, indeed, the classification made at this Board of the Brahmins as plutocrats, as the rich portion of the population?—Oh, no.

828. Did you come across any ruling princes who were Brahmins?—Yes.

829. Who?—I was trying to think. We had one down in Madras, Kollengode.

830. He is not a ruling prince?—No, he is a Zemindar.

831. Is there one?—No, I do not remember one.

832. Did you come across any great merchants who were Brahmins, to your knowledge?—Not to my knowledge.

833. Did you come across any great Zemindars who were Brahmins? Kollengode, whom you mentioned, is not a Brahmin?—My difficulty was that I could not put them through their catechism.

834. So far as your experience goes, there is no foundation for the suggestion that Brahmins are a plutocracy. Would you say you found them an aristocracy of birth and intellect rather than a plutocracy of wealth?—I did not find them a plutocracy.

835. May I ask you if, as an impartial traveller, you carried away from India the impression that the Brahmins, even in this 20th century, are chiefly priests?—I would say in answer to that that I do not think of them as priests, but I thought of them as men of high intellectual attainments, men with good heads and good brains.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).] Ought not we rather to direct ourselves to Lord Southborough's experience as a member of the Committee?

Sir J. D. Rees.] With great respect I submit this is very material.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).] I hope you will not carry it too far.

Sir J. D. Rees.

836. You have been concerned as Chairman of the Committee which sent in these Reports, and this question being, as you say, the most important in Madras, where you had the greatest of all your difficulties, I submit that it may be material to ask you whether you think there is any shadow of justification for the suggestion that the Brahmins exercise a priestly tyranny in India to this day?—It is very hard for me to answer that question.

837. Very well, I will leave it?—You have my colleagues. I am very loth to talk about things I do not understand.

838. Did you hear when you were in Madras—you have spoken of the movement—did you or not carry away the impression that the anti-Brahmin movement was financed and supported by the rich and important persons in the Presidency, who are chiefly non-Brahmins?—If I may answer that question in another form, I would say that I carried away the impression that the great majority of these people—these 4 to 1—if they would apply their united vigour and political capacity to winning the elections, and to making their way way in the political world, would do much better in that way than by asking that the Brahmins should be suppressed.

839. And, in point of fact, would not the same ability which enables them to organise representation here in England be sufficient to enable them to obtain seats by election?—Yes; I should have thought so. I should certainly have thought that they could have obtained seats if they really laid themselves out to work an organisation of such numerical strength. It seems to me there is something extraordinary—which is unexplained—if they cannot, being in a majority of four to one, obtain seats; but I am bound to say that they said they cannot do it.

840. Did you carry away the impression that what was unexplained was that this caste feeling is organised into an opposition to this reform scheme, and exploited for that purpose? Do you think that is the explanation?—Oh, no. I heard a great deal about people in power and position in Madras being responsible for the agitation; but, putting aside the highest political aspect of the whole thing, it really seemed to me that Dr. Nair and his people were legitimately afraid that, under the great change of circumstances coming in Madras, they could not win seats and obtain place and power.

841. Have you any knowledge of the conditions on the Malabar Coast which have created and maintained the opposition and hostility between the Brahmins and the Nairs which exists to this day?—No.

842. Turning to the representation of British commerce, would you say that the Europeans in Bombay, or in other large towns, are hostile to these reforms, provided that their interests are duly safeguarded?—That, again, is a very difficult question to answer. I would say that, after conversations with many of them, as distinct from evidence given, you will find three classes of men of the type: one class who recognise that something of this sort is inevitable, and must be done, and done promptly——

843. Mr. Hogg would be one of them, obviously?—Mr. Hogg, obviously. He signed the Report. You have another class, who would rather that things remained as they were. That is purely conservative, purely passive; and a third class, which I am bound to say is a small class, as I made out, who would do nothing at all.

844. Is there a feeling growing even in those quarters that the march of Democracy in the rest of the world has not left India out, and that something must be done?—That is quite certain.

845. You referred to the representation of the Mohammedans in Bengal; are not the Mohammedans of Bengal chiefly converts to Mohammedanism? You do not know that?—I would rather not answer that.

846. In proportion, as they are converts to Mohammedanism, and continue to speak Hindoo languages, and to practise their Hindoo customs to a great extent, would not the need for more extended communal representation be proportionately reduced? Do you see any ground for giving them further representation than was recommended by the Bengal Government itself?—No, not at all—the Bengal Government's recommendation and the Lucknow compact. Going back to what I said before, we used the Lucknow compact, not slavishly, but as a guide, and endeavoured to test it by evidence—to get evidence in support. When we get to the Bengal Government, and the Bengal Government say: "We have made provision in our scheme," or: "We agree to provision in the scheme being made equal to that of the Lucknow compact," then I do not see why there should be any Mohammedan addition to it at all.

847. I am only asking you whether the fact that these Mohammedans have not the feelings, or do not speak the language, of the real Mohammedans by race and descent accentuated your argument?—I quite appreciate the point of the question, but I am not sufficiently familiar with the history of the Mohammedans in Bengal to answer it.

848. As regards female suffrage, may I ask you whether it does not amount to this: that the intelligentia who gave evidence were mostly in favour of it? Even the old-world Hindoos did not come forward much, or were not brought to you, were they?—We got evidence of both kinds. I think that from wherever the evidence came the impression raised in the mind of the witness, after what had so recently taken place in this country, was that the Committee or the Chairman, or some of us, would think it a very unreasonable thing if he were to say he was against women's suffrage, and so he tried to meet us on the principle by saying, "Yes, well, women's suffrage is quite a good thing to have; I do not see why you should not have it." Then, like my friend Mr. Hogg, he said he would not make any arrangements for it.

849. Do you know as a fact that in Vedic times the women of India were perfectly free, and that at present the purdah is a Mohammedan institution?—I made some very long journeys in India, and read a great many books, but I am not going into that.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

850. May we ask you to come back on Monday?—Oh, yes, any time you say.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).] Then Mr. Bennett will begin his cross-examination, and we shall have had an opportunity of reading your Memorandum

(The Witnesses are directed to withdraw.)

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Earl of SELBORNE.	Mr. BENNETT.
Lord BRODRICK (Viscount Midleton).	Sir HENRY CRAIK.
Lord ISLINGTON.	Mr. MONTAGU.
Lord SYDENHAM.	Major ORMSBY-GORE.
Lord SINHA.	Sir J. D. REES.
	Mr. SPOOR.

The RIGHT HONOURABLE THE EARL OF SELBORNE IN THE CHAIR.

The Right Hon. Lord SOUTHBOROUGH, G.C.B., G.C.M.G., G.C.V.O. (a member of the House of Lords), and Sir FRANK SLY are re-called; and further Examined, as follows:—

Mr. Bennett.

851. I think you took a great deal of evidence with regard to the admission of women to the Franchise?—(Lord Southborough.) We had a great deal of evidence.

Mr. Bennett—continued.

852. Did you find in going through India that there were variations in the progress which women had made socially and educationally?—My opinion is not so good on such a subject, probably, as that which you would get from those who have lived in India for a period of time like my friend Sir Frank Sly, but it certainly was presented to me that that was so.

853. There were differences as between Province and Province?—Yes.

854. Did the intellectual conditions of women in the Bombay Presidency, for instance, impress you as in any way different from other Provinces?—I do not think I came in contact with women in the Bombay Presidency—I am speaking of Indian ladies—either in evidence or in society, that is, so much as in other places; but, of course, from the point of view that we are discussing, namely, the Franchise, and so on, Bombay is probably ahead of the others because of its Women's Franchise. It has more experience.

855. Did you hear how the Municipal Franchise for women had worked in Bombay? Had they availed themselves largely of it?—I am bound to say that the evidence was not very satisfactory. You will understand that in the present condition of affairs in India relating to the social position of women it cannot be very satisfactory. You have the ladies who probably would like the vote, and would like to take a part, but who for reasons of purdah, and so on, are unable to do so. You have ladies who have emancipated themselves to a great extent from the restrictions imposed upon them, and then you have ladies who have emancipated themselves from every restriction. The result, I am bound to say, was not altogether satisfactory from a European point of view—from our point of view.

856. You did see a difference in the progress that has been made by women, I think, in Bombay, as compared with other parts of India?—I must answer you indirectly, and merely say that that was what I was told.

857. There is to be no uniformity—the principle has been determined upon that there will be no uniformity in the Franchise as throughout India, but that it will be determined according to the conditions of the various Provinces, and therefore will be by rule and regulation. Did the Committee ever consider the application of that principle to the questions of the women's vote? I mean instead of being a universal disqualification of women, did they consider the possibility of variation, so that if there was a Province in which women were sufficiently advanced, by rule a vote might be conferred upon them?—I do not think they did.

858. You did not consider it? Now, as to the non-Brahmin vote, is there not some danger of people being misled by the expression "non-Brahmin" so far as it appears to indicate a homogeneous community?—Yes, indeed.

859. And it is far from that, it is absolutely heterogeneous, is it not. It is split up?—Yes; that was the evidence we received. You are speaking of Madras, of course?

860. Yes?—There are many variations of caste down in Madras, all going to make up this vast population of non-Brahmins.

861. Are there no men of influence among the non-Brahmins? Dr. Nair has gone, but did you find a perceptible number of men associated with him who could influence the non-Brahmin community?—I should have said, bearing in mind the system of political exposition in the country, that there was certainly evidence of power somewhere to force and press a propoganda upon the people of Madras; but by whom that was done other than Dr. Nair, I do not know. I imagine that he must have had Lieutenants.

862. You would say from what you saw and heard that they are a community able to take care of themselves?—Yes, but as you are aware, we were deprived of the primary evidence, the best evidence we might have had if we had had an opportunity of cross-examining Dr. Nair and his immediate friends.

863. Has not some of the agitation, some of the movement for communal representation, been somewhat unreal. For instance, as illustrated by this fact—I should like to know whether it came to your notice—that Dr. Nair, while leading the non-Brahmin community, himself supported for election to the Legislative Council a Brahmin against a non-Brahmin. Has that incident come to your notice?—I have some recollection now, that you mention it, that we did hear of such a case. I tried to make a general point in my evidence in chief that it was a remarkable fact that the non-Brahmins pressed for the exclusion of the Brahmins altogether from having anything to do with the elections on the ground that they could not even trust a non-Brahmin candidate if there was a Brahmin in the wind.

864. Did that appear to you as an extreme proposition?—Well, it did, indeed; it struck at the whole basis of an electoral system.

865. Did you find that in Madras elections were determined entirely by caste considerations, that personal merit had nothing to do with the selection of a candidate as apart from his caste qualifications?—I think the evidence was divided on that point, as far as we had it. I am bound to say that I think the view of the Government of Madras itself was that the Brahmin held the field, or that the Brahmin certainly would attempt to hold the field under the new condition of affairs, and that he would succeed in doing so. Some of us, after listening to the evidence put before us—I would say that it was my opinion for what it is worth—rather came to the conclusion that there was springing up in Madras a considerable volume of intelligent political thought, but that it was in its infancy, and that one reason for all this trouble is that these men, who are now, for the first time in the history of Madras, coming to the front and beginning to understand the meaning of politics, of place and of power, have found themselves bumping up against the Brahmin on the threshold of their campaign.

Sir J. D. Rees.

866. Does Madras mean Madras City or the Presidency?—I was thinking of the Presidency.

Mr. Bennett.

867. You were speaking of one instance of a Mohammedan, having been elected by a constituency mainly Hindoo?—Yes.

868. So that it is not a political fact that Brahmin votes for Brahmin and non-Brahmin for non-Brahmin?—No, I agree. That is why I referred to the fears of the opposition; that is why I referred to the feared influence of the Brahmin over non-Brahmin candidates. If the Brahmin is really all that he is described to be according to the evidence, and according to the information we got in Madras, he would be able to turn the non-Brahmin into a Brahmin for the purposes of the election.

869. After all he is not superhuman I take it? We must take him as human. Now there is a question connected with the depressed classes. I see the Committee and the Government of India differ on that question, and the Government in their letter say that officials may be expected to bear in mind the interests of the depressed. Is not that expecting very little indeed? I will put the question in another way: Did you hear that official representatives in the Legislative Councils had been expected to look specially after the interests of the depressed classes?—No, I do not think I heard that. I daresay that will be a familiar point to those who have been accustomed to live in India. Certainly my Committee gave a great deal of attention to the question of what was to be done for the depressed classes.

870. Were you impressed by the objection of the Government of India that you have allowed only seven representatives of the depressed classes out of about 800? Do you still think that is adequate?—I am bound to say that I think the Committee gave great consideration to the position of the depressed classes. We were accustomed to ask wherever we went whether there were depressed classes, what the numbers were, whether representation was possible, whether it was desired, and, if so, what sort of a representation it was to be. We never neglected to take evidence of that sort, and the result of our investigation, apart from that expressed in the Report of the Committee, is given in the Memorandum which was circulated on the last occasion, in paragraph 10. The Committee's proposals are based on considerations very different from those urged by the Government of India; that is the line we took. Where we recommend some representation by nomination we did not take into account the population of the class concerned, nor did we attempt to give any voting strength, but to provide only one, or, at most, two, nominated members for the purpose of securing that the particular class or interest should be in a position to represent its views in the Council. Again, it will be quite impossible for the depressed classes to provide the number of suitable representatives recommended by the Government of India; indeed, with a much smaller number proposed by the Committee it was clear that there would be great difficulty in some Provinces in obtaining suitable men from that class for nomination, and that it might be necessary to nominate members of the Depressed Classes Mission or European missionaries to represent their views. Further, there was the strongest desire amongst all clases of witnesses to reduce the number of nominated members to the lowest possible limit. The acceptance of the Government of India proposals would involve a reconsideration of the amount of nomination recommended not only for that class, but for the aboriginals, etc. That was our view, and we thought, rightly or wrongly —and I think the Presidential and Provincial Governments agreed—that the best thing to do with those unfortunate people was to find really good men acquainted with their case, nominate them, and put them in to speak for them, to watch and urge. That is, a man would be there who was an expert in their interests, and if he came, as I apprehend, before the Council and pointed out certain disabilities, certain glaring and bad cases, he would attract a fair number of the elected representatives of the Council and would receive very hearty support from the officials. That was the line we took. I am bound to say that on the evidence, which is worth something in these cases, it was made perfectly plain to us that when you got into a particular province and said, "Now then, we want five or six people to represent the depressed classes in the true sense of representation," we would not get them.

871. In that case would not it be an advantage if something like a statutory or quasi-statutory obligation were placed upon official representatives to look after the interests of the depressed classes? Do you think it is sufficient for the Government to indicate the duty of the officials in that regard by saying, as they say here, that the officials may be expected to bear in mind the interests of the depressed classes. Should not there be a more direct instruction?—I think the phrase runs between the two extremes.

872. When you went to India did you find yourself new to problems which were intensely complex and unique on the social conditions of India?—Certainly, I had never been in India before.

873. And is it not the fact that your Committee was forced to accept all the great questions of principle as choses jugées before they had been accepted by the Cabinet or Parliament?—I am afraid I do not quite follow the question, but if I do the answer to it is this, that we had our terms of reference given to us both by the Home Government and the Indian Government. We had before us the pronouncement, as it is called, which was made in Parliament, and we had before us the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, which I admit it was assumed would be treated as a basis of operations.

874. So that I may say that you were precluded from examining into the merits or the demerits of any principle?—Do you mean inside the terms of our reference, or outside?

875. Any principle embodied in the Joint Report or in the known views of the Government of India?—Well, I cannot quite go so far as that, because in listening to all these witnesses who are scheduled to our report we naturally had to listen a great deal to questions of general policy and specific points which came close to our reference when deciding upon the franchise and electorates and so on.

876. Then you would not say that you were absolutely convinced yourself that your proposals were the best possible in the interests of the masses of India?—The franchise proposals?

877. Yes?—Given the acceptance of the policy under the pronouncement made in Parliament and the line of direction pointed by the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, I would defend the Committee and say that I believe it did the best possible.

878. I suppose you regard communal representation just as I did for a long time, as a shocking violation of western electoral principles?—Yes. If I were drafting a constitution with a free hand I should scout it.

879. But if you had studied the conditions of India on the spot for five and a-half years, might you not have come to the conclusion that communal representation was practically the only way of protecting the masses of India from the undue influence of the upper classes?—I was quite content to embody in the Report these communal electorates which you find there, because I really believe that they are necessary to give effect to the system which we have mapped out.

880. I think you said Dr. Nair did not give evidence because of the composition of your Committee, which contained two Brahmins, but are you aware that his main objection, as he stated it to me, was that the only two Hindoos on your Committee had both committed themselves in advance against communal representation. That, I understood, was the basis of his objection?—That is the basis of the objection stated in Dr. Nair's letters and letters from one or two other people scheduled to our Report. It was stated that two of the Indian gentlemen on the Committee had already made up their minds on this question before the Committee was appointed.

881. As you quite see, that was the cause of the very strong protests which I have received. Do you think those protests are altogether unreasonable?—It was quite impossible for the Committee to try that issue.

882. Quite?—We were there on the spot, a Committee appointed by the Indian Government and the Home Government, and we found ourselves there with two highly respected colleagues who were singled out for particular attack. I never turned to the right or left in the consideration of the question. I said "Dr. Nair ought to come before the Committee and ought to help the Committee and help us in every way, and so ought his friends, but I really cannot consider what course he should take" (which I was invited to do) "if he objects to the composition of the Committee.

883. But a plaintiff in the Law Court who knew a judge was committed in advance against him might object to going into that Court?—Certainly; and sometimes he goes into the Court and tells the judge that he has an objection to him.

884. I think you said the question, which is really a question of lower castes, mainly affected Madras, but, of course, you remember that in Bombay there are 5,200,000 Mahrattas?—Yes.

885. In 1910, when the Morley-Minto scheme was set up, no Mahratta had any chance of election beyond a nominated one. Do you think under your scheme a Mahratta would ever get a chance of being elected?—We gave very careful consideration to the Mahrattas. We fully recognised that they had some case, although from my recollection, they did not come forward and all speak with the same voice. Some of them wanted to take their chance in the open electorate; some of them came and said they would be severely damaged unless they had communal representation. You will have noticed that in our Report two of our members were inclined to support the Mahrattas and give them some special protection. They did not insist upon it to the point of disagreeing as to the constitution for Bombay, which was unanimous, but they said they would have preferred that some such special protection should have been conferred. The majority of the Committee thought otherwise, and they thought otherwise because we went very closely into the thing and came to the conclusion that they would be able in the parts of the country where they are most populous, and in double-membered constituencies, to obtain a certain number of seats, and we felt it was better that they should obtain those seats in open fight and struggle than by some semi-artificial system.

886. In Madras the number of Brahmins and the number of Indian Christians is almost exactly the same, but I think your Committee realised that Christians had no chance of election?—Yes.

887. And therefore you gave the whole community three seats with an electorate of 6,000 out of 1,137,000 native Christians because you felt they had not a chance?—We thought a great deal about the Indian Christians as we travelled round India and held these various inquiries. Some of us were impressed with their position and their future. It appeared to me that, taking Madras as an instance, there was a great deal to be said for the Indian Christian. He was a man, as it seemed to me, who was more likely in the future to help to break down the caste traditions than any other type of Indian, for reasons which the Joint Committee will understand. And so we went very carefully into the case in Madras, and I think I am right in saying that the clergymen and others whom we saw favoured the system that we adopted. One of them was in favour of accepting no representation at all; one well-known ecclesiastic would have desired to stand out altogether, because he was afraid that the work undertaken by the Indian Christians would follow different lines if they became immersed in politics. But, on the whole, we thought that the proper way to deal with the Christians was to give them a representation so that they could make their particular wishes known. It was not so much the quantity but the quality.

888. I am sure you realise that the native Christians have the highest percentage of literacy in India after the Brahmins, and nearly twice the literacy of Mohammedans?—Yes.

889. Do not you think, therefore, that your electorate of 6,000 is rather small?—Is it your point that they should have more representation?

890. A bigger electorate?—I see. I think that the Committee would have listened sympathetically to evidence directed to that end. I do not withdraw what I said, but I am reminded that in considering the evidence in Madras and throughout India, too, we had always present to our minds the desirability of making the vote somewhat of the same value in each constituency, that is the Mohammedan and the Hindoo and Christian, and that was why the Christian constituency was so framed.

891. I notice the Government of India in their criticisms of your Report propose to increase the representation of the depressed classes by nomination, and your chief objection in your rejoinder was that these classes cannot provide a sufficient number of representatives to meet the proposal of the Government of India. I am afraid I disagree with you on that point; but are you quite sure of your ground?—I can only say that we started out with every desire to help the depressed classes, and we certainly had in mind—at least I had—I daresay my Indian friends and Civil Service friends knew better—the idea that we could give them representation—that there must be people in such a mass who were fit for nomination. But the evidence was against it, and as far as I was concerned my mind gradually went round to the point of feeling that the only thing to do was to give these people the most expert nomination that we could find, hoping that in the course of the decade, or whatever it is, for the review of these things, they would have so improved their political standing that they could look after themselves.

892. Did your Committee consider the very important note by Sir Alexander Cardew which is published by the Government of Madras?—Yes.

893. You know, of course, that Sir Alexander Cardew has made a special study of the depressed and the lower classes. These are his words:

Is it wise to entrust the happiness and progress of the down-trodden and illiterate Pariah and Panchama community, or even of the ill-educated and politically backward non-Brahmin Hindoo castes, to an assembly in which the majority will probably be largely composed of and controlled by Brahmins, and will in any case be drawn from the literate community representing only about 7.5 per cent. of the population? Is there here a sound basis for democratic institutions, and is it likely that such a scheme will guarantee 'ordered progress for India as a whole?'" Do you regard that statement as exaggerated?—I forget what he proposed to do.

894. I do not know what he proposed to do. I am only dealing with his note?—I think that was the difficulty we felt with regard to it. It was no doubt a very able minute, and an ably prepared statement, but it left us in the air.

895. You were pressed last week by Sir John Rees to state that there were no Brahmin chiefs in India. Are you aware that there are eleven Brahmin chiefs in the Bombay Deccan alone, and, though their States are small, some of them are very good and progressive rulers?—I am not very good at Brahmin chiefs. I could not examine them and put them through their catechism.

896. You were very wise, and did not give a direct answer to Sir John Rees. You were also questioned by Sir John Rees last week, and to-day by Mr. Bennett, as regards the influence of Brahmins. May I quote one sentence from an experienced Indian civil servant? It begins, "At the present moment an agitation is proceeding in India which is caused entirely by and restricted to Brahmins and other high castes in sympathy with them," and he goes on to say that the continuance of European representation in India was absolutely necessary for the purpose of safeguarding the lower castes from possible want of consideration on the part of the upper castes. Those are the words of Sir John Rees. Do you think they are exaggerated?—I do not know what happens to a witness if he tries to get himself in between a member of your Lordship's House and a member of the House of Commons.

897. The Government of India, on page 11, say this in criticising your franchise proposals: "We shall find it hard to meet the charge that we are acquiescing in the establishment of an oligarchy in Madras, unless something is done to secure to the non-Brahmins a fair share in the Legislature. It would, in our opinion, be a mistake to wait for any move by the non-Brahmins." Do not you think that is rather a serious statement?—The last part?

898. The sentence I have just quoted on page 11?—Yes. The handling by the Government of India of the proposals in the Franchise Report in this respect are not plain to my mind at all. They appear at first to take the line that they must fully support the non-Brahmins' claim, and then, as the clause was amended, presumably in Council, it comes down to merely a half-hearted proposal in favour of reserving seats, which is quite another matter. And, as I said before in my evidence in chief, having regard to all our difficulties, we thought that the best thing we could do was to take and make a draft constitution on sound and well-known principles, the kind of thing that was accepted in Bengal, and leave it at that until the non-Brahmins came forward and said, "We will be content with some exceptional variations of an ordinary constitution; if you will give us that we will endeavour to make it work well, and we will play our part in the development of Madras." That was our line.

899. Then you think, on this non-Brahmin question, the Government of India has changed its mind?—I think a great deal of this essay discloses change of mind, paragraph by paragraph. If the Joint Committee have read the despatch with great care, it bears upon it, to my mind, the impression of commencing in red and ending in black or beginning in black and ending in blue. It is quite extraordinary in the various paragraphs to see the variations of opinion which appear, but that, I assume, it was impossible to avoid because of the amendments which were proposed in Council, and which brought different results, attempts to compromise, and failure to compromise. That is peculiarly so, as you will see, with such a thing as the question of the Mohammedan representation in Bengal.

900. May I take it that you do not agree to the proposal of the Government of India to reserve thirty out of sixty-one non-Mohammedan seats for non-Brahmin Hindoos?—I think that the non-Brahmin Hindoos should not have thirty out of sixty seats, or any other number unless they come forward and state, as suggested in our paragraph in the Franchise Report, that some such settlement as that would make the constitution satisfactory to them.

901. In reply to Lord Islington last week you very candidly said this, that you were extremely puzzled by by this whole business, and that you always felt that there was a great deal below the surface. Now, will you take it from me that there is a great deal?—The Brahmin business? Yes.

902. You will take it from me?—I felt it before.

905. When you were in Bengal did you come across representations from the Namasudras or the Mahishayas, who are actually organising themselves to try and get representation?—Yes, we did. We set out in the Report the various classes who came before us in Bombay.

904. There are rather large bodies in Bengal?—Somewhere in the Report we referred to them. It is paragraph 18. "Claims for separate electorates were placed before us by numerous other communities, such as the Mahishayas of Bengal and Assam, the Maarwaris of Calcutta, the Bengali domiciled community of Bihar and Orissa, the Ahoms of Assam," and so on.

905. You did consider representation from those bodies?—Yes, we did.

906. Do you see any difference in principle between communal representation seats for Mohammedans, Europeans, and Anglo-Indians, and communal representation for the lower castes of Hindoos?—Do you mean the depressed classes we have been speaking of?

907. The lower classes we have been speaking of, the non-Brahmin lower castes—any difference in principle?—I would much rather you put that question to Sir Frank Sly or to one of my colleagues, because I see objections to communal representation in every form except where one has to yield in order to do justice to a particular case, and I am not sufficiently conversant with the claims of the people to whom you refer to be able to say whether I feel that it would be a good case or not.

908. I think the Committee may assume that you would have been prepared favourably to consider a scheme for giving representation to the lower castes if the lower castes had presented such a scheme to you. What do you say to that?—To the depressed classes in Madras?

909. Yes, I think you said you would have been prepared?——

Chairman.] Let us get that quite clear. Are you talking of non-Brahmins or depressed classes?

Lord Sydenham.] I am talking of both.

Chairman.] Will you put them separately?

Lord Sydenham.

910. Yes. (To the Witness.) You would have been prepared to receive and consider favourably any proposal for the representation of Dr. Nair and his followers if it had been presented to you?—I cannot say consider favourably. I understand the question now. We looked anxiously for proposals for communal representation or any other form of representation that Dr. Nair and his friends would like to put before us, but I cannot say that we should have considered them favourably. What I said in my evidence-in-chief was that we felt that the onus lay very heavily indeed upon Dr. Nair and his friends to show why, with a vast majority, something like 22 to 1, I think, in the population, and 4 to 1 in the electors, they could not hold their own against a small community. On the other hand, with great respect, I say that we would have tried to do justice if the scheme had been put before us.

911. You would have tried to do justice if you had had a concrete scheme put before you?—Yes.

912. And therefore their not putting forward that scheme has to some extent prejudiced what you might have done for them?—Most undoubtedly.

913. Now, a few words about the Mohammedans. Did you feel absolutely bound by the Lucknow Compact?—No, we did not. When we commenced our labours our attention was at once directed to the Lucknow Compact; that is, the part of it which dealt with the representation of Mohammedans. As you know, we had on the Committee Sahibzada Aftab Ahmed, who represents the Mohammedans on the Secretary of State's Council. He played a very conspicuous part all the time, and, if I may say so, a very able part, in endeavouring to adjust the Mohammedan representation in collaboration with Mr. Sastri and Mr. Banerjea. It was perfectly certain that unless we managed to preserve in some way or other the concordat between these two vast communities we could not expect to get through with our labours and bring them to a satisfactory conclusion. Answering your question further, what I say is this, that given this concordat (unexpected and valuable as it was), we said we will use it as a guide, and as we take evidence from place to place we will test and see how far it can properly be made use of for the purposes of allocating representation.

914. I suppose you know that the Moslem League represents really a small number of Mohammedans, and it has been repudiated by most of the Mohammedans of Northern India who are forming organisations of a separate kind of their own?—You mean now?

915. For some time past; for some two or three years past?—All I can say in answer to that is that a vast amount of the evidence which we had in India was in favour of maintaining the compact. The greater amount of evidence we had from Mohammedans was in favour of maintaining the compact. The evidence against maintaining the compact which we received was from very distinguished people, no doubt, but people who were described to me as belonging to the old orthodoxy.

916. You realise that it would be possible to obtain any amount of Mohammedan evidence against the compact?—Well, you understand that I desire to discuss this from a judicial point of view, having been Chairman of this Committee. All I can say in answer to that is that we did hear the evidence tendered.

917. The Government of India pointed out in their criticism that in Bengal the Mohammedans get only three-quarters and in the Punjab nine-tenths of what they ought to have on a population basis, while in other Provinces they seem to get too favourable terms. Do not you think that is certain to create some discontent among the Mohammedans when they begin to realise it?—Well, I suppose it is true in every department of life. When you have made a treaty which has involved a great deal of give and take, you are certain to have a strong representation later on that you might have got a little more or might have given away a little less.

918. I am sure you realise that the mass of Mohammedans repudiate this treaty and never had anything to do with it?—I cannot say that. The evidence we had and the collaboration of the Mohammedan representative on the Committee led one to the opposite conclusion.

919. I could give you plenty of evidence, but I will not proceed further. In the United Provinces they have an electorate under your scheme of 1,483,000 people, and they have got a literate population of 1,186,000, but the Punjab has a literate population of 614,000, and you have given only an electorate of 237,000. Do you think that is equable?—That question goes to the root of the composition of the electorates for the various Provinces and Presidencies. In the case of the United Provinces we took the figures put forward by the Lieutenant-Governor, and they were, I admit, very liberal. In the case of the Punjab we took the figures put forward by Sir Michael O'Dwyer, and they were, I feel, very conservative. It was our aim and object, as far as we could in launching this scheme, and bearing in mind that it was open to review, that it was not making a constitution for all time, but was open to review at the end of ten years—we felt that it was wise of us as far as possible to accept the proposals of the Local Governments even where there was considerable inequality exposed.

920. I am sure you realised in the course of your visit to India that the urban population of India is very small compared with the rural population, and that practically nearly 80 per cent. of the people live on the land and pay by far the greater part of the taxation of India. Are you satisfied that under your scheme of franchise the land-owners and the tens of millions of people who work on the land will have adequate representation commensurate with the taxes which they pay?—I am quite sure that the representation tion accorded the urban and rural population under this Report is quite sufficient to make the beginning to which I have referred.

921. Do you think it desirable, even at the beginning, that it should be on an equitable basis as regards the tax-paying population of India?—I do not mean to ask a question, but forgive me for putting it in this way. Does the question mean that we ought to have increased the numbers of electors very much, on the ground that there are people of a similar kind to those we propose to enfranchise who pay taxes?

922 No. My point was merely this. Are you providing sufficient membership in Provincial Councils for these people who pay all the taxes and do most of the real work of India?—In the Provincial Councils? I misunderstood. That is a very difficult question to answer, but the best I can say without consideration is this, that there again we found the heads of the Presidencies and Provinces very adverse, at this early stage of the proceedings, to large bodies. Some of our Indian friends were anxious to have much larger Councils for the very purpose that the noble Lord has in mind; but we came to the conclusion that, at any rate at the commencement, we ought to pay respect to the opinions of the Governors and Lieutenant-Governors and Chief Commissioners, and we kept the Councils down as low as we could consistently with what we felt at the moment would be a sufficient representation.

923. In the Government of India's criticisms they suggest there should be a larger proportion of rural representatives, and your reply to them was that this would be most unpopular with the educated classes and the town residents. Is not that exactly what one would expect?—I think so, yes.

924. May it not follow from that that the educated classes and the town residents are right and, therefore, that the rural population, which is a vast majority, might go to the wall?—I am bound to admit—I want to be quite frank about it—that we were under continual pressure to give large representation to urban districts, and I have no interest or desire to say anything to the contrary. No doubt that was to a great extent because the people who represented the urban districts believed themselves to be better educated and better fitted for this form of government than those who live in the rural districts. I do not think anybody would deny that there is something to be said for that. We had to strike the mean in such a way that, while we endeavoured to give reasonable representation to the urban people, we did not so cramp the rural people as to atrophy them.

925. Under your scheme a general election would entail the registration, in the first instance, and the polling, or attempting to poll, of about 5,200,000 people, largely illiterate. Now, was every Local Government convinced that it would be able to poll out its quota in these out-of-the-way districts?—Every Local Government, with the exception of Madras, took upon itself to say in evidence that it would accept the responsibility.

926. Did you inquire of each Government whether it was satisfied that it could prevent fraudulent voting over these huge areas, or the suppression of votes?—We asked them all whether they felt that they could make adequate provision for the honest carrying out of the election, and the answer was in the affirmative.

927. I think you proposed the residential qualification of candidates in some Provinces and not in others. Was there any reason for drawing that distinction between one Province and another?—The question of the residential qualification in a constituency was a very difficult one. Some of the Provinces were strongly opposed to anything of that kind, but the only real, full opposition to it, speaking from recollection, came from the Punjab—the only real, strenuous opposition. They, including their Lieutenant-Governor, objected to it very much on the ground that they could get very good local candidates from among the peasant-proprietary of the Punjab. In other parts of India there was very strong pressure indeed not to exact the qualification on the ground that the proper way to find a candidate for a constituency is to look for the best man with the best brains, wherever he may come from. Of course he would have to be within the Presidency or the Province, but not necessarily within the constituency. That was the issue. Two or three of us, of whom I was one, placed no confidence at all in the residential qualification for a constituency, and as far as I was concerned I would have struck it out altogether on the ground that it is so easily evaded. How are you to be sure that a man has a qualification in a constituency unless you keep him continually under your observation? More than that, in this case there would probably be a year and a half or so before there is a General Election in India. Directly the Bill has passed through Parliament everybody will proceed to make his arrangements as to where he is going to stand for, and I could not see that there was anything to prevent a man from making his arrangements to nurse, as we say in this country, any constituency within the Province or the Presidency. So that my own view was against anything of the kind. My Civil Service colleagues—I ought to have referred to them first perhaps—were of the opposite opinion, and they would not have shrunk from going so far as to define in some special form the character and quality of residence which the candidate should have. I think Sir Frank Sly, when he is called, had better speak for himself on that account. The difficulty is this: suppose you say there must be two years' residence in the constituency, how are you going to enforce that qualification? What does it mean? Suppose he goes away for six, eight, nine or twelve months in the middle of the two years? Suppose he sub-lets his house for a time? I can imagine that a lawyer would be able to drive a coach-and-four through pretty well any definition as to what real residence was.

928. If it were not for the dangers of evasion to which you have drawn very forcible attention, would not residential qualification be a protection for the rural population against the management of their elections by caucuses in the big towns?—Oh, I think so. Yes, if you could do it. I quite sympathise with the Punjab. I would not like to commit myself to the full proposition over all India, because in other places the circumstances may be different, but as regards the Punjab, where they have a good peasant proprietary, I can quite understand that they may say "We would like to have a choice of candidates in our constituencies," so that they may elect a peasant proprietor and keep out a barrister or a pleader. I quite understand that, if it could be done.

929. You know we have always had residential qualification in Bombay, and we considered that it worked well. I do not know whether the present Government thought so?—I forget at the moment what they said about it. I think they did.

930. You said a few moments ago, in answer to Mr. Bennett, that the evidence you had, as far as Bombay is concerned, with regard to the question of women franchise was not satisfactory; can you give me any idea how many women exercise franchise rights so far as municipal elections are concerned?—I am told we could not get any statistics.

931. I think you are aware that quite a considerable proportion of women have exercised the municipal franchise for a good many years?—I am quite aware that women have exercised the franchise for a long time, but you must not pledge me to its being a large proportion of them.

932. Probably we shall be able to get the information in the course of the sittings of the Committee. Sir James Meston told us the other day, and I am sure you will agree with him, that during the last thirty years there has been an enormous change of feeling in India, an awakening of political interest, and more particularly during the last ten years, and, I am informed, also even more during the last five years?—Yes.

933. I take it that women have shared in that advance?—I think so. I hope you will not assume that we were hostile to doing anything that we could for the women. I do not think you were here when I gave my evidence-in-chief on that point.

934. I have read the whole of your evidence. What I want to get at really is the general trend of feeling in in India regarding this question of women's franchise. I gather from your evidence that there is a fairly decided opinion in one direction, that is, in favour of giving women the vote?—We received a great deal more evidence in favour of giving votes to women than I should have thought possible, with one's preconceived idea on the subject, but as I ventured to say in my evidence-in-chief, when the subject was sifted with the male witnesses in cross-examination it came down to this: They said, "Why do you not help the women on their course of progress by giving them this badge of progress?" When you said to them, "How can they avail themselves of it?" the nearest answer to practicability we could get was, "Oh, well, you see, you can have women polling officers, and special places where women can poll, or women election agents, polling agents, who can go to the women's houses and collect their votes, and all that sort of thing." That we did not think at all desirable or politic.

936. Would you agree that if it is demonstrated that, so far as municipal elections are concerned, women vote satisfactorily, they are entitled to the wider franchise, and if these practical difficulties can be overcome?—I have to fall back there upon expressing considerable doubt as to whether the exercise of the franchise in the municipalities, with the probable exception of Bombay, has been of such a character as to make it expedient now to extend the franchise to the whole of India for the larger purposes which we have in view. I think you will find when you have before you one or two of my Indian colleagues that they will tell you that it is indiscreet and inadvisable to hurry this business. There is a very large conservative body of feeling in India still, and it would be dangerous to outrage it.

936. In your evidence you stated this the other day, with regard to the composition of your Committee—you used the words that it represented every school of thought. I would like to ask you, as I am particularly interested in this side of the question, whether the interests of labour were represented on that Committee in any adequate degree?—No. But I would like to say a word on that, if I may. At some period of our inquiry we thought about labour, not only from association with labour at this end, but because a great deal of attention was being attracted to labour difficulties by the strikes in Madras and Bombay. I raised the question myself in Committee as to whether it would not be expedient to give the Executive of the future power to nominate some representative of labour interests. I was assuming, when I did that, that there was already sufficient labour organisation in the great trades in India to produce a man here or produce a man there who would be cognisant of the desires of labour, but the information we got on that point was negative. We may have been wrong, but we did not find that it would be the prudent course to say that there should be a labour representative, because at the present time the labour organisations were not sufficiently formed to produce the kind of man who can be so easily got in this country. And so we left it in two or three cases, as you have no doubt observed, that there should be nomination of a person conversant with the desires of labour or the aspirations of labour, feeling quite sure that the Governor of the future would find that sort of man in the labour organisation when the labour organisation was complete. In the meantime, we would have to look for him among those who merely take a general interest in labour problems.

937. You agree that it is desirable that the industrial classes of India are privileged to use the political weapon. We know to-day that they have two weapons. We hear a great deal about that in our own country. We hear about political action and direct action. It is not desirable that the latter should be the means the Indian worker should use to improve his condition. It is much more desirable that he should come along on constitutional lines and adopt political methods?—I do not know. There is extreme dissimilarity at present between the two problems, the problem in the West and the problem in the East. You would probably hear unmeasured surprise expressed at the appearance of any Indian labour on strike, let alone all the variations of method by which a strike may be produced.

938. But I think you will agree that generally it is desirable that the Indian worker should have an opportunity to improve his condition by political means. The reason I ask that question is quite obvious. The vast majority of the industrial workers in India are apparently to be excluded from the operations of this Bill if the recommendations here are adopted?—That would depend upon whether they were qualified or not, you know. If they come within the franchise anywhere, which goodness knows seems low to us, they would be voters. But I would again say to you, and with sympathy, that I think we did all that we could at the moment by bearing labour in mind and introducing into those particular Councils the thought of labour by a representative. I do not see what more you could have got unless you had made a special franchise of labour. As time goes one, and there is a revision—there is no finality to this, as there was in South Africa or Washington, as I said before—the change will become very marked, and the pressure for a different form of representation, I should think, might be successful.

939. The basis of your suggested scheme is a property qualification, but do not you think it would have been possible to have extended that somewhat, and to have included as a qualification for the franchise a certain earning capacity? I believe that that obtains with regard to Municipal and Local Board purposes?—I cannot honestly say that we faced that problem, because, as I put it to you, labour did not present itself to us as we saw it on any basis except that of seeing that it got some representation. But we had all sorts of pressure brought to bear upon us to increase the electorates by introducing forms of franchise. For instance, in the early stages of the inquiry it was seriously discussed whether we should not allow a man to have a vote who had had a certain measure of education—that kind of thing. But whether we did well or whether we did ill, both our Indian friends and our other friends agreed unanimously that we must stick to the property qualification for the time at any rate.

940. You did not really face the question as to whether the franchise could be widened by making earning capacity a basis? You are aware of the great amount of criticism and dissatisfaction existing in India at the extreme narrowness of this franchise, and it is with a view of seeing if it will not be possible to widen it along quite reasonable lines that I am asking this question? Moreover, one wants to safeguard the industrial worker. The Indian worker is not very highly paid, and does not come under your present scheme?—I was reminded just now by Sir Frank Sly that we did consider the question of a franchise for the labour in Assam—that is, the labour in the tea gardens, and so on. There you had evidence of desire, at any rate, to help. But we found on inquiry, and on consultation with the Government of Assam, that we could make nothing of it at the present time. The people were wage earners, and they were earning, for India, good wages; but they were entirely under the supervision of the employer of labour. They shift about from plantation to plantation, and so on, and I do not think that giving them the franchise would have any other effect than putting a certain number of votes at the disposal of the employer. You understand that the situation is not yet ripe?

Chairman.

941. Did you have any figures given to you as to the proportion of the population in India that are wage earners in the European sense?—No.

Lord Islington.

942. Did you take any evidence from missionaries of labour?—No, not on the point that the honourable Member is putting to me. We took evidence of missionaries upon subjects generally.

943. I mean on the point Mr. Spoor was putting?—No, not on the point whether labour should be represented.

Mr. Spoor.

944. I take it that you definitely abandon as impracticable the idea of a literacy test, although that would, of course, increase the electorate somewhat?

Mr. Spoor—continued.

—I think that at this first experimental stage, having regard to the views of the Local Governments and the polling capacity of the Local Governments, we were running pretty high when we found our figures had got up to 5,000,000.

945. I notice that in Universities, for some reason or other, only Fellows are to be allowed to vote. Why should Graduates be excluded?—The position is this: as you see the Government of India does favour the abolition of the University vote altogether. We did not know that, but we went through this course of instruction with regard to that matter; first of all we had to consider the question of the literacy vote; then we had to consider whether the University vote should be on a similar basis to that exercised here by some of the older Universities. Then came a third proposition, namely, whether the Universities should have each two members, one of them to represent merely University purposes, that is, to be elected by the Senate, and so on, and the other a man of affairs representing the University as a man of affairs and distinction is chosen to represent Oxford or Cambridge. All those proposals were explored, and, naturally, I paid considerable deference to the views of my Indian colleagues upon such a subject as that. I do not mind saying that I had a fancy myself for dual representation, that is for the man who would sit for a University as representing public affairs, probably a distinguished man, and also a member representing University affairs. But as the inquiry proceeded the literacy franchise disappeared; we were not pressed, and I am glad to say we were not pressed, to recommend that. Then came the question as to the University seats and what should be done for them, and in the end the Committee was unanimous in finding that the balance of opinion was in favour of reducing the representation to election by the Senate. In answer to the Honourable Member, one reason why the graduate was not in the end included in University representation was, as I recollect it, that there was really in our opinion no special universal standard of University education which would justify us in saying that we had found a good standard class of voter.

946. I believe it is correct that about 80 per cent. of the Fellows are nominated by the Government. Is that so?—I do not know how that is. We did not, as I say, express any particular desire that this form of University representation should be adopted. It was the University representation finally proposed by those who are responsible for the Universities, not the Government, but the Dons. We had not got in our minds at all that by providing these seats we were going to give the Government any particular pull in the electorate. The Government of India, very radical as it is in regard to these special representations, suggests that they should be struck out altogether. I was rather surprised, if I may say so incidentally, at the radicalism of the Government of India with regard to these things, because we put into our Report, thinking it the conservative line to take, certain voting forces which we believed to be of a conservative character, such as the landlords, soldiers—officers, that is—who have given long service in war, title holders and others. We were liberal to the Europeans, and there were one or two more cases of the same sort. The Government of India are not attracted by that conservative and stabilising line at all. If you read their despatch carefully you will find they wish to eliminate this class of voters, or, at any rate, to reduce them.

947. Other questions which I have down have been anticipated by Lord Sydenham and Mr. Bennett. I will only ask you one finally. I take it you will agree as the result of your experience in India, that there is an overwhelming volume of feeling in the country that there should be a share for the people so far as the Central Government is concerned, in responsibility and in control—that they feel that this is not a real measure of even the beginnings of responsible Government unless they have the same in the Central Government as in the Provincial Governments. Did you find that overwhelming volume of opinion?—No, I cannot agree with that at all. The opinion we had was this, that given anything like the proposals put forward by the Local Governments, the franchise and numbers of electors, and so forth, it would make a very good start with the machine tending towards responsible government.

948. Have you found this opinion amongst Indians and Europeans?—Yes, certainly, without any hesitation.

Sir Henry Craik.

949. I want to ask you about this Congress League compact. Are you in agreement with the Government of India that if you had a clean slate to write on you would not feel yourselves bound by that Congress League compact?—If we had had a clean slate to write upon the proper course to have taken would have been to examine the population in each Province and to deal with it by apportionment of seats as between Mussulmen and Hindoos, almost, as one might say, by a rule-of-three sum.

950. Your reason for supporting this arrangement of the Congress League compact is that that compact was made and has obtained a considerable amount of support, not because you think it will always operate very justly?—No. The objection to adopting the compact is the same as the objection to adopting the communal system. We should hope that as time goes on and the political situation changes, a good slice of political ambition will be found common to the Mussulmen and Hindoos. Directly you find that you begin to get agencies at work upon the compact which will probably solve it.

951. In time we would hope that it would be, but meanwhile, as applied actually to any particular Province, it might be found very unfair in its operation in the early stages, and it might give rise to a great deal of friction?—I do not know that, but I should have said that the disparity, the serious part of the thing, is to be found in the Provinces where the Mussulman population is very small.

952. Agreeing with you as to the desirability, if it were possible, to apply this compact, the Government of India proposes to depart from it in certain particulars?—That proposal with regard to adding ten seats in Bengal is one of the most astounding propositions I ever heard of in all my life.

953. I only want to bring out that, agreeing with the Committee as to the desirability of accepting a compact so much supported, they yet find themselves bound to make proposals that would depart from it very considerably in important points?—You mean the Government of India does?

954. Yes. The Government of India must not do this. The thing is quite out of the question. The Bengal scheme was practically an agreed scheme; the Bengal Government asked for the Lucknow Compact terms and they got them, this proposal in Clause 24 of the Government of India's Despatch is a most amazing proposal.

955. There is no alternative between either accepting the compact or proceeding to decide upon exactly a proportional basis in each Province. Those are the two alternatives?—Yes.

956. You cannot mix them together?—No. The compact must fall if you depart from it in any particular place—it seems to me to be common sense.

957. I want to ask you a question upon a subject which is referred to in your Report, but has not been touched upon in the evidence at all. You do restrict plural voting to a certain extent, but you leave it in a considerable number of cases. It is on page 41 of your Report. You allow plural votes in a certain number of cases—land-holders, Universities, and in commerce or industry seats, which are pretty numerous, but you do not allow the ordinary voter to vote in more than one constituency?—The evidence we received was to this effect. The witnesses, and the Indian members of my Committee, were against plural voting for the ordinary voter, that is, a man living in a constituency was not to vote in respect of his estate A and also his estate B, but they thought it fair and reasonable that a man who had an estate in a constituency and also a University vote should be allowed to exercise both.

958. Suppose a man has a stake in two constituencies, you do not allow him to vote in both?—No.

959. He

959. He must choose one?—Yes, that is so. He cannot vote twice on his property qualification in the Province.

960. But you give him votes in special representation?—Yes. You find, as I put it to you, the case of the University vote would be one.

961. I was coming to that, but Mr. Spoor has somewhat anticipated it. At paragraph 11 of your reply to the Government you say, "The abolition of this existing privilege, which is supported by the British precedent, would be greatly resented," but you understand that the University representation in India has no remote resemblance to University representation in this country as we understand it?—You mean this representation as we propose it?

962. Yes, or as it exists?—That is so.

963. It has not the remotest resemblance to University representation in this country?—No.

964. You do not propose to enlarge the electorate by the inclusion of all registered Graduates?—No.

965. Which alone would be the expedient for putting it upon a footing of University representation in this country?—Yes.

966. That does include all registered Graduates and expressly excludes Honorary Graduates?—Yes.

967. And in which the governing bodies of the Universities are really a matter of no importance at all?—I am aware of the system.

968. Why not give that?—It is a subject rather difficult to discuss, I think. I agree with my own memorandum, with what we say on page 3 in answer to the Government of India. There was extreme pressure put upon us to maintain the University representation, and I still think and still state that if that representation is withdrawn there will be serious dissatisfaction from the class of people interested in it.

969. Could you tell me from what classes that extreme pressure came?—It came from the educational classes.

970. Do you mean the educated classes or people connected with educational administration?—The latter.

971. That is not a representative class; that is a very small class. Did it come from the large body of educated people or professional people?—No, it came from the educational classes. We began with the widest question, namely, as to whether there should not be votes for all persons who could pass a literacy test. We rejected that. Then we got to the next question, namely, whether in University representation the Graduates should find a place, that is, whether the representation for the Universities should be wide or whether it should be narrow. In the end we found that the requirements would be met by this particluar form of representation. But the demand for this particular form of representation in default of getting more, was pressed upon us by the educated classes throughout India.

972. This time you use the word "educated" classes, not "educational"?—Yes, the educated.

973. Do you compare the literacy test with a degree of the University? The literacy test, I presume, merely means that he can read and write, but the University degree would mean really something a good deal higher?—Yes.

974. It is hardly upon the same footing, the literacy test for ordinary electors' representation and that for a highly-educated body like the Graduate of Universities?—The comparison is very difficult as between our conditions and theirs. We did not find that we could make a good comparison which in our judgment would make it expedient to say that a Graduate of an Indian University should necessarily have a vote.

975. You do not think that it would be an important thing to have a large class of professional—I do not want to call them educated—but professional men and women represented, such as we claim is represented in the University constituencies here?—It was the opinion of my Committee that it was inexpedient to go further than we did.

976. If you exclude that idea then your University representation merely means that the governing bodies of the Universities have nominees?—You see, we tried to view the whole situation. We have the Ryots and the small people coming in for the first time. We did honestly look round to see where we could find steadying influences. We thought—my Indian friends quite agree with me—that where we could find good men and introduce them into these new Legislative Councils—men of knowledge of government and experience of history, and so on—it was quite the right thing to do at the beginning, and for that reason we did it.

977. The representation being to a large extent a nominated one they would be more or less of the character of nominated members?—I would not mind that.

978. Then you do not defend this proposal in the least as a large representative matter?—No.

979. But merely as an expedient from certain administrative points of view?—Yes; it ought to find you men who in their range of life would be of the character of fellows and masters of colleges.

980. You really abandoned the hope of making all the Universities a really representative constituency of professional educated men in India?—We did not abandon the hope that it might be done, but we felt that conditions at present made it inexpedient.

981. You prefer not to enter upon the reasons?—I think, when I say that my Committee as a whole, after examining all those educational proposals, large and small, became unanimous on this particular one which is now before you, that I can add little more.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

982. Speaking generally, you carried the Local Governments with you in all these recommendations, did you not?—Yes.

Chairman.

983. Except Madras?—Viscount Midleton said: "Speaking generally." You have the difficulty about Madras in mind, of course.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

984. Yes; therefore you deprecate a further reference to Local Governments which would only cause discussions practically between them and the Government of India?—Certainly; I see no reason at all why the Government of India should set to work to write letters to the Provincial Governments on these subjects. I see every danger in it.

985. You looked upon your Committee rather in the light of umpires to bring about a compromise as far as they could, and if that compromise was upset it would cause a re-opening of many questions?—I do not know whether I quite assent to the word "umpires." We were not an arbitrator as between two opposing factions. I think I would rather say that we went out there to answer the questions on the Terms of Reference to the best of our ability.

986. At all events, you endeavoured to find some via media among conflicting views, and in the main you adopted those of the Local Governments?—Yes; always holding on as tightly as we could, having regard to the extraordinary circumstances, to sound constitutional principles.

987. I wanted to ask you about the question of disqualification of candidates for the Council, on which the Government of India differed from you. Are the principles involved very large?—I should think not. There was a great deal of feeling about it expressed in one form or another. I do not know whether your Lordship has the point in mind. The regulations are not to hand, and so I have not got them to put in. But the point is really this: The Executive in old days, and up to now, very naturally claimed the right, by Order, to send away a civil servant and to say that he should not be eligible to stand for such Councils or positions as there are. We were pressed very hard to abolish the disqualification of the civil servant who had been sent away, and between us, or some of us, we hit on the device of saying that it should not be a disqualification unless he had been sent away for something which involved moral turpitude. That was intended to be a compromise. The compromise was not acceptable to all of us. Giving my own view for what it is worth, I know perfectly well from one's experience of this end of the world, that if you want to make a constituency love a candidate, let the Executive say that he is not a proper person to represent them, and they will go on electing him until kingdom come.

come. That is the fact, and that is why, as far as I am concerned, under this new régime, with elected bodies, I was not prepared to make anything a disqualification or to disqualify anybody, not because I am anxious to see a bad man or a man who has been guilty of turpitude, moral or otherwise, sitting in the Legislature, but because I know that the way to get up a row is to say that the Executive can keep him out. Remembering what the Government of India say upon the subject let me draw your attention to the conclusion of the paragraph in their despatch: "The Committee, though they make no mention of the fact, further propose to omit altogether the important rule which empowers the Governor in Council to disallow the candidature of any person whose character and antecedents are such that his election would be contrary to the public interests." The reason why we made no reference to it was because it was bound to be abrogated: "This rule was introduced in 1909, after much discussion between Lord Morley and Lord Minto's Government. Its loss may be inconvenient, but we are not disposed to press for its maintenance; we incline to regard a provision of this nature as inconsistent with the new conception of representation." So that with regard to people whose character and antecedents are so bad that their election would be contrary to the public interests, there is no difficulty. The difficulty arises in the case of an unfortunate civil servant who has signed the attendance book on three or four consecutive days at the wrong hour and is dismissed for it. I think if the Government of India could see their way to give up the last regulation they might just as well give up the lot.

988. With regard to the direct election of the Council of State, the Government of India made a proposal which you point out would involve an electorate of 1,500 only amongst a population of 40 millions in Madras. Have the other cases of direct election which they have proposed been as striking, or would the electorates in other cases be larger compared with the population?—Proposed by the Government of India?

989. Yes; the Government of India proposed a direct electorate of only 1,500 out of 40 millions in Madras. In other provinces would the numbers have been more in accordance with the population?—I cannot tell you. I do not know in the least what they would have been.

990. You object to direct election because you could not get a satisfactory electorate?—We could not get support for direct election now. There was always the hope that it might come, but there was no support for it on the present occasion, because of the duplication of elections and the difficulty about the duplication of the franchise. It was always hoped that it would come some day; everybody expressed that hope—all the Local Governments—but we neither got evidence in favour of it this time nor any scheme by which it could be carried into effect.

Mr. Montagu.

991. Speaking for yourself alone, did you find that it would have been likely that your franchise proposals would have been different if it had not been for the limitations in your terms of reference?—I do not think that we were crippled in any way by the terms of reference, except on one point, which I will refer to presently, if I may.

992. As regards the franchise, the first question Lord Sydenham asked you seemed to suggest that your franchise proposals were limited by the fact of your terms of reference so far as communal representation is concerned. Do you feel that yourself?—I do not think of any lines that we might have struck out for ourselves which we did not strike out under the terms of reference.

993. There is no limitation of communal representation in your terms of reference, is there?—Oh, no. And the position was supported by the speech made by the Viceroy at a later date.

994. A few more questions on this vexed point of non-Brahmins and their position. I think you have already stated in evidence that the two added members of your Committee when you were investigating Madras were both non-Brahmins?—Yes.

995. And that the non-Brahmin question was acute only in Madras?—Yes, certainly.

996. Would you have apprehended that your Indian colleagues would have been unfair to non-Brahmin claims if the non-Brahmins had come before them?—No.

997. I think both Mr. Banarjea and Mr. Sastri are known to you as members of the Moderate party?—Yes.

998. You have seen that the Moderate party at their Congress have suggested the reservation of seats for non-Brahmins and for Mahrattas?—I had not seen that.

999. If you were to give communal representation as the non-Brahmins asked for, as you yourself have said, that would give communal representation by exclusion to the Brahmins?—Yes.

1000. Did any Brahmins in Madras ask for that?—No.

1001. What would be your view of their reception of communal representation for Brahmins if it were proposed?—I am afraid they would object. Mr. Sastri will give his opinion upon that. With regard to the other question, namely, the recommendation as to the seats, I am sure you will qute understand that the Committee have never expressed any opposition to the aceptance of that principle as long as it is the price of peace. But it is not what they ask for. They ask for communal representation. The proposal for seats falls far short of the large demand they made upon us. If they would take it as a happy settlement I should certainly be glad.

1002. You have said that the non-Brahmin controversy with the Brahmins is not acute except in Madras; I suppose there is the material to produce it in many other parts of India, is there not?—That is a hard question to put to me, and you can get a much better answer from someone who is more familiar with Indian life. I can only say that we did not find ourselves open to the attack when we were sitting as a Committee.

1003. Have you heard that the Madras Government is to hold elections this year, whereas all the other provinces have postponed theirs? Has that come to your knowledge?—I did hear it.

1004. Can you give any suggestion as to the reason of that? Is it in any way to give a test of the possibilities under the existing system? What do you think is the reason? Would you rather I reserved that for somebody else?—I think you had better reserve it for someone with local knowledge.

1005. One further question, with regard to women's franchise. I think you said that it was advocated, not so much because the women would use it, as for the educational assistance the vote would give to women in India?—Yes.

1006. I will quote your exact words?—I accept the words.

1007. It was something of that kind?—Yes.

1008. Is not that a reason why the vote is advocated for many other people besides women in many countries?—I want to say "could use it" rather than "would use it," which probably makes all the difference to your question.

1009. How do you mean?—Because the difficulty in India is that ladies are not in a position, for reasons you well understand—Mohammedan ladies and other ladies are not in a position to use a vote, whereas, I take it, in other countries, say in Italy or New Zealand, they are in a position to use the vote fully the very minute the franchise is given them.

1010. These were the words you used: "A great many of them will not vote, you know; but still it will be such a good educational thing for them to have the vote"?—That is what was urged upon us. I thought you were treating it as though I had said it all myself.

1011. Are not there similar reasons for giving the vote to a large number of other people besides women?—Certainly, it is clear that other people might come and say: "We should be greatly benefited by having the vote."

1012. Is it not the case in a large number of places, such, for instance, as Bombay, that the so-called Labour interest, the people who work in the mills, are in reality countrymen who at certain seasons of the year leave the mills and go back to the land?—I understand that is so. Of course, that is very much what happens in South Africa.

1013. With regard to literacy, do you yourself hold that the capacity to read or write is any evidence at all as to the intelligence with which a man will know which of two candidates best represents his views?—Not at all. I have known eminent scholars who obviously voted for the wrong man.

1014. Was there any evidence brought to your Committee against the Lucknow compact in Bengal?—Yes, by two or three witnesses—two or three eminent Mohamedan witnesses.

1015. You are aware that the Government of India are very anxious that this Committee should not settle this question of franchise at present, but there should be further time for consideration by Local Governments and others of the proposals of your Committee, and I shall be charged with putting that view to my colleagues when we come to deliberate on the evidence. The argument will be something like this—I am putting it to you because I want you to answer it for me—that when the other parts of the scheme on which this Bill is founded were put forward, when the Montagu-Chelmsford Report had been prepared and published, a long time elapsed for people to formulate or even to revise their views, even though they had been consulted in its preparation, and they desire a similar process for your report, and chiefly they wish to consult Local Governments upon their criticisms and suggested amendments. I know you have said in your memorandum in answer to their despatch that you see no reason to refer the matter again to the Local Governments. Would you mind just saying generally, is it your opinion from what you have heard, that this Committee should decide this question, or do you think there is reason for any further equitable revision of the subject?—I have no doubt whatever that if the Government of India embarks on a correspondence with the Local Governments, the Presidential and Provincial Governments, the principal effect will be to set them by the ears. The evidence, which is very scantily referred to, if referred to at all, in the Government of India Despatch, was heard by the Committee and was considered by the Provincial Governments The whole case is before the Provincial Governments already, and taking perhaps the only really extraordinary important thing in the Government of India's proposals, namely, that ten Mahomedans should be added to the Bengal Council, what is the good of opening up a correspondence with Lord Ronaldshay's Government upon that point when it is in evidence. superabundantly in evidence, that his Government asked for the representation of Mahomedans which the Committee gave them, and asked for the details of the scheme which the Committee gave them? To open up this correspondence, as is proposed by the Government of India, in so far as the Government of India is dissatisfied with the report, amounts to an endeavour to use the Local Governments as an appeal from the Committee.

1016. One last question: The whole of your examination and the whole of your two statements have been confined to the report of the Committee over which you presided. May I just ask whether you would care to make any other remark to the Committee about the Bill, or whether you would prefer to confine your testimony to your Committee?—I think, following a well-known principle of law, the Committee will be well advised to take the good primary evidence which is awaiting them without relying on my evidence on those subjects which must after all be in my mouth secondary evidence. So far as the Functions Committee was concerned, although I only watched its proceedings and was in touch with my friend, its Chairman, throughout the whole of the deliberations, and did some negotiation as to settling points before the report was published, yet the fact remains that I should always be talking to you upon lines of secondary evidence when you can get primary evidence from him and his colleagues. So my answer is in the negative.

Chairman.

1017. I have one or two questions to ask you. You are opposed to communal representation?—I do not think communal representation is a wise thing to put into a constitution if you can possibly avoid it.

1018. Why?—Well, in the first place, taking the Madras case, you perpetuate eternally those divisions of thought between one class of the community and another. They do not matter so much if they are political, but when they become religious they are really serious. That is one reason, and an all-governing reason. I should have liked, I should have preferred very much, to say to the Mahomedans and to the Sikhs, "Go in and do your best. Do not shut yourselves up in these boxes."

1019. Are you not arguing really from Western experience?—You asked me a question as to what I thought about communal representation. My own opinion upon it is not evidenced in my own report, because I have given communal representation to the Mahomedans and the Sihks and to others.

1020. But the whole trend of your report and your evidence is that it is a necessary evil. I want to ask you why you think it is an evil. Is it not because it is so contrary to our English experiences and customs?—I would not have said that. Our report discusses communal representation on those lines. We had, as a committee, an onus thrown upon us to justify—peculiarly justify—communal representation in consequence of the terms of the Montagu-Chelmsford report. That is, we started out with the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, telling the world through the Cabinet here that communal representation was a thing to be shy of. That pronouncement, although it was relaxed to a great extent by the Viceroy's Speech, was bound to tincture our method of dealing with the subject, because we had really to show, as your Lordship says, that in India the subject could only be dealt with otherwise.

1021. I will sum up the points I want to make on this subject by asking you this question, and I agree that it is a point more against the Montagu-Chelmsford Report than against your report: Has not the evolution of human society in all its aspects through many centuries been totally dissimilar in India and in England?—That extends over a long time: I do not know whether the lines have been running parallel all through the centuries, and have kept at equal distance, or whether in very early days here we approximated towards Indian life, or Indian life in early days to ours. I think Sir John Rees asked me whether I did not know that in earlier times the women in India were quite free to go where they liked and do what they liked.

1022. I did not ask you that. I asked you whether the evolution had not been totally dissimilar?—Well, I am not prepared to say that it has.

1023. You are not prepared to say it has?—No.

1024. Are you prepared to say that it has been similar?—I am prepared to say that in later years the evolving political side has moved much more quickly towards our position.

1025. Social evolution, I am talking of, not political?—Oh! social evolution?

1026. Social was the word I used—the evolution of society?—I am not putting it in the form of a question, but I will merely say, can you separate the social from the political? I should have thought that in Indian society the one was involved in the other.

1027. That is your opinion?—I suggest it as an answer.

1028. You are not prepared to say that the evolution has been similar, and you are not prepared to say it has been dissimilar?—You mean on the social side?

1029?—Yes?—To give an answer, I will say that, in my opinion, the evolution on both the social and the political side has moved very quickly, or much more quickly than in old days, towards our position.

1030. Now I want to turn to the proposed electorate for the Council of State. You have proposed that the elected members of the Legislative Assembly and of the Council of State should both be elected by the same persons?—Yes, unwillingly.

1031. Your reason for this recommendation, as I understand it, is that the members of your Committee would not have unanimously agreed to any other proposal?—The members of the Committee would have agreed to a resolution in favour of direct election both to one and to the other, but they never would have agreed upon the form of the direct election either to the one or the other. There was not a chance of it.

1032. They would have agreed to the general principle, but never to its application in any particular form?—That is so. Your Lordship will see we were in this difficulty with regard to it. All the Presidencies and Provinces favoured indirect election. I am not bothering about Bihar and Orissa. She asked for it first, first, and changed her mind. They were all against it. The fact is that they did not want it for this occasion, because, among other things, they thought they would have quite enough to do with other things —the electoral roll, and so on—and we never got any evidence in favour; we never got any brain power set to work upon systems of direct election. We did not get help from the Presidencies and the Provinces in this respect or expect it.

1033. You said this recommendation was made with great reluctance?—Yes, because it is so obvious that there are grave objections to electing to these two bodies from the same body, and in some cases by such small constituencies.

1034. Would it be a fair summary to say that you think it a possible, but not a good, solution?—Oh, no; not at all. I should respectfully object to that. I say it is the best solution for this first term.

1035. You would say it is the best solution for this term?—Yes, I would. May I just say a word about that. It was not within the terms of our reference, but I think that there might be something to be said if, as is quite natural, the Committee thought that new blood would be an advantage to the Council of State, that the Legislative Councils should be precluded from voting anybody into the Council of State who is a member of those bodies or a member of the Assembly; that is that the voting authorities to the Council of State should be compelled to look outside for the senatorial character who is not playing any part in either the one class of assembly or the other, but who might very probably like to take an honourable position in the Council of State. You might conceivably find a Mohammedan gentleman of considerable position who would not stand an open election in a constituency, but who would be quite prepared to allow himself to be nominated for the Council of State. By that means I conceive you might get fresh blood all the time; but, if I may say so, I think that it is a point which should be put to the Indian witnesses, because I am not sure—I have not talked to them about it—that you could find the requisite number of detached men.

1036. You left the question of non-Brahmin representation in Madras to a certain extent open?—Yes; your Lordship will bear in mind we did not hear the case because the witnesses would not appear.

1037. Why do you say the case should be made by the non-Brahmins to the Government of India rather than to this Committee?—Well, what we thought was this, first that there would be some time after the necessary legislation had passed here which might be occupied by the Government of India in settling the question of how many seats should be reserved, and that, I think, was the more convenient means of doing it, because they would be able to send down and hear the witnesses on the spot. That was one point. Another was that, looking at the position from far off Madras, we doubted very much whether a Joint Committee of the two Houses here would really want to settle the constitution for Madras; and thirdly, we did not think that the legislation necessary to give effect to your Lordships' report by this Parliament should not assert the principle for Madras that you decide to be the best, which, of course, my Committee would say was the Madras Scheme which they have scheduled to their report. We really felt that a Committee of both Houses of Parliament would not desire to sit down here and endeavour to prepare a constitution and decide this very knotty question. We foresaw that at once people in Madras would say they wanted to be called as witnesses.

1038. As regards the non-reservation of certain seats in Bombay Presidency for Mahrattas or Lingayets, I understand that the Government of Bombay is in accord with your Committee in that matter?—Yes, that was so.

(After a short adjournment.)

THE HON. BABU-SURENDRANATH BANERJEA is called in; and examined, as follows:—

Chairman.

1039. We are much obliged to you, Mr. Banerjea, for your answers to our questions and your statement (see Appendix X.), which have been of great assistance to us. I think you represent the National Liberal League?—I do, and the Moderate Conference.

The following are the questions and answers:—

1. Do you accept the proposition that it is desirable to bring about the progressive realisation of responsible government in India? and, if so, how do you define the expression "responsible government"? And do you, generally, accept the proposition contained in the Preamble?—(1) Yes. (2) Responsible government means a Government of which the Executive is responsible to the Legislature, that is to say, is removable by the Legislature in certain recognised ways. (3) No. The Preamble should be amplified, so as to make it quite clear that it is the object of the Bill to provide for responsibility in the Central Government, as well as in the Provinces. I suggest the introduction of a measure of responsible government in the Central Government simultaneously with its introduction in the Provincial Governments, though not, perhaps, to the same extent to begin with; also, the second paragraph should indicate that it is the object of the Bill to provide for devolution of authority from the Home Government to the Government in India, and relaxation of the powers of superintendence, direction, and control vested at present in Parliament in regard to India in so far as the Executive Governments in India are subjected to the effective control of the Legislature.

2. Do you think that the realisation of responsible government in the Provinces involves the establishment in Provincial Legislatures of a substantial elected majority (Clause 6)?—Undoubtedly.

3. Do you think that the non-official members of the Provincial Legislatures should possess power to control the actions and policy of the Executive? Do you think they possess such power at present?—(1) Yes. (2) No.

Chairman—continued.

4. Do you think that there are certain matters or functions of government in the Provinces in which, at present, the Provincial Executive must remain responsible to the Secretary of State and Parliament, and must, therefore, be in a position to enforce its wishes?—I have accepted the policy which reserves at the start certain functions to the Executive Government.

5. If you accept the propositions stated under questions 1 to 4, do you think that the dual form of government embodied in the Bill is the best means of securing them? If not, what are your objections to that feature of the Bill, and by what other means would you attempt to secure the objects in view?—Yes.

6. If you have any other method to suggest, does it (i) provide possibilities of advance by stages and facilitate the "progressive realisation of responsible government," and, if it does, in what way (Clause 2, 3, etc.)? And (ii) does it afford means of judgment (a) to the electors and (b) to the Statutory Commission which is to examine and report on progress, of the success or failure in results of the control exercised by the Legislature and those who represent it in the Executive?—I have suggested no alternative, and it does not seem to me that any other method will meet the requirements of the announcement of 20th August, 1917.

7. If you consider a dual form of Government, acceptable in principle, are there any points of detail the modification of which you regard as necessary? If so, what are those points, and what modifications would you suggest?—I consider it essential that (1) There should be a common purse, accompanied by joint deliberation of both the parts of Government before the Budget is framed. (2) The Budget resolutions of the Legislature, whether whether on reserved or transferred subjects, should be binding on the Executive, subject to the power of certification provided for in the Joint Report; (3) That the Executive Council should consist of two members only, one of whom should be an Indian. (4) That the Minister should occupy the same position as to salary, status, etc., as members of the Executive Council. (5) That there should be Standing Committees, both as to reserved and transferred Departments, and Under-Secretaries, as suggested in the Joint Report; and (6) That "taxation for Provincial purposes" should be a transferred subject, and no proposals for taxation should be brought forward before the Legislature without the approval of the Minister.

8. In particular, do you think (i) that the Ministers should hold office "during pleasure"—i.e., should be liable to removal if they are unable to support the action decided upon in their Department by the Governor, or if they fail to retain the confidence of the Legislature (Clause 3 (i.)? (ii.) That the Governor should have power to disregard the opinion of his Ministers, if he considers that action in accordance with that opinion is inconsistent with the due discharge of his responsibilities (Clause 3 (3))? (iii) That the Executive Council should, in all Provinces, normally consist of one official European and one non-official Indian (Clause 4)? (iv) That the Governor should have power to dissolve his Legislative Council (Clause 7 (4)?—(1) Yes; but the expression "during pleasure" should be construed as meaning liability to dismissal from office on the Ministers forfeiting the confidence of the Legislature, and in no other sense. This is rendered necessary by the change which makes the Ministers responsible to the Legislature from the start. The position of the Governor, therefore, in relation to the Ministers, should be that of a purely constitutional Governor.

9. Referring back to questions 2, 3 and 4, if your answers to the first and third of these are in the affirmative, and if you think that the Legislatures should be given greater powers of control and influence than they possess at present, do you regard the limitations imposed generally by Clause 9 of the Bill upon their financial and legislative powers as (i) suitable, or as (ii) unnecessarily severe, or as (iii) inadequate to safeguard the responsibilities which the Government owes in the last resort to Parliament (Clause 9)?—I consider them to be unnecessarily severe. It is apparently implied, but must be expressly provided that taxation proposals must be passed by the Legislature before they can take effect. Proviso (b) to Sub-Clause 2 requires, in my opinion, to be modified by this proviso in the interest of the "safety or tranquility of a Province" must be subject to a certificate setting forth the emergency. As regards "the carrying on of any Department", which includes the transferred Department, the power has to be much more restricted. If the Legislative Council refuses to vote the necessary supplies for "the carrying on of any department," the Governor should have power to spend upon it only the limit of the previous year's expenditure, and until a fresh Council has been elected. It is assumed that when the Council refuses supplies it would be dissolved, and an appeal made to the electorate. The Governor should have no larger power than what has been stated above, of authorising expenditure upon an emergency "for the carrying on of any Department." The expenditure on this latter object should be such as the Legislature may have already sanctioned or may thereafter sanction. Proviso (d) takes away an existing power. Private members must be allowed to move resolutions, as heretofore, even as between transferred and reserved subjects. The blocking power provided for in Sub-Clause 5 of Clause 9 should be dropped. Sub-Clause 7 of Clause 9 makes the assent of the Governor necessary to the alterations to Standing Orders. This provision should be dropped.

10. In particular—(i) Do you think that the Legislature should have power, with whatever limitations, to vote supplies (Clause 9 (2))? (ii.) Do you accept the plan of Grand Committees as the means of giving to the Government the power to secure essential legislation in the event of their failure to carry their propositions in the Council? If so, have you any modifications of detail to suggest? If not, what other method would you suggest to secure the object in view?—(i.) Already answered, yes. (ii.) Yes, provided the Grand Committees are constituted with a bare majority for Government, as in the Joint Report.

11. Do you accept the position adopted in the Bill (Part II.) that the time has not yet come to give the Legislative Assembly a similar measure of control over the Central Government as that given to Provincial Legislative Councils over Provincial Governments?—No.

12. Do you agree that it is advisable none the less to provide for a substantial elective majority in the Indian Legislature (Clause 16)?—Yes.

13. Do you accept the plan of a bi-cameral Legislature as arising out of this, as constituting both a satisfactory machine for the ordinary purposes of legislation and as affording the means to the Governor-General in Council to secure legislation which he regards as essential (Clauses 14, 15, and 16)?—The Council of State is designed to secure legislation which the Governor-General in Council regards as essential. It must undergo drastic modifications before Indian opinion accepts it as a regular Second Chamber. Perhaps an adaptation of the Grand Committee procedure would be preferable.

14. Do you accept the provisions of the Bill as to the course of legislation in the Indian Legislature (Clause 20 (3) and (4)), or do you regard them as unnecessarily restrictive on the popular will, or as an inadequate means of ensuring to the Governor-General in Council the discharge of his responsibilities?—I consider the Joint Session as a suitable means of settling differences between the two houses in uncertificated legislation. As regards Sub-Clause 4 of Clause 20, the words "in the interest of British India or any part thereof" should go out. The Crewe Committee says:—"Following the phraseology of the Joint Report, we recommend that the Governor-General should be instructed that, save in the case of absolute necessity, no measure should be certified for enactment by the Council of State without previous approval of its substance by the Secretary of State on the ground that the legislation proposed is essential in the interest of peace, order, and good government of India." We note that the words employed in Clause 20 (4) of the Government of India Bill, regarding certification by the Governor-General in Council, are "safety, tranquility, or interests of British India or any part thereof," which appear to be of somewhat wider import than those in the Joint Report.

15. Do you accept the changes made by the Bill (Clause 21) in the constitution of the Governor-General's Executive Council? If not, what are your reasons, and what modifications would you suggest?—The legal qualification required in the case of one member under the present law should be maintained in a modified form, so as to permit the appointment of men with Indian qualifications.

16. Do you think that the development of Provincial autonomy on the one hand, and of self-government in the Provinces on the other, involves any modification of the provisions of sections 2, 33, and 45 of the Government of India Act (Clause 23)?—The recommendations of the Crewe Committee not having been reduced to the form of specific clauses to be added to the Bill, I am unable to deal with this question adequately at present. But two points seem to be clear: (1) the devolution must be made statutory; and (2) it must be placed beyond the risk of revocation.

17. Do you agree that the gradual realisation of responsible government involves periodical examination of progress by independent authority, and that the provisions of Clause 28 of the Bill are well designed to afford such examination?—Yes. The proposal for further transfer of subject at the end of five years from the operation of this scheme should be embodied in the Bill. Also Clause 28 must make it clear that the Statutory Commission will inquire into the means of extending responsible government in the Central Government as well as in the Provincial Governments.

18. Are

18. Are there any matters which it is proposed in the Bill to deal with by rule which you would suggest should be provided for in the Bill——

19. Have you any observations to offer on the Reports of Lord Southborough's Committees and of the Committee on the Home Administration of Indian Affairs?—I accept the recommendations of the Southborough Committee except the disqualifications based on dismissal from Government service. I generally agree with the recommendations of the Crewe Committee as summarised in pages 13 and 14 of their Report, subject to the reservation that half of the members of the India Council should be Indians; and, further, I am of opinion that Sir James Brunyate's suggestions for grouping of All-India subjects into categories of "popular" and "controlled" should be accepted with an element of responsibility in the former. I would further urge, as regards their recommendation, (iii.) That care should be taken that the control of the Secretary of State should only be removed to the extent that the control of the Legislature on the spot is substituted for it. Lastly, I would urge that previous consultation with or the sanction of the Secretary of State should not be required in any matter —including fiscal—in which the Government of India and the Legislative Assembly are in agreement.

Major Ormsby-Gore.

1040. Speaking broadly, what would you say are the main criticisms of the National Liberal Federation on the Bill as it now stands? What are the principal points to which you would like to draw our attention? —The points are these: In the first instance, we support diarchy, not because is is an ideal system, but because it seems to us to be the only feasible system for giving effect to the message of the 20th of August, 1917. It provides for responsible government at the first start, and it brings responsible government within sight by providing progressive stages, and therefore we support it. In the second place, we are anxious that the provisions relating to Budget control, which are set forth in paragraph 256 of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, should be given effect to without any attenuation of any kind. That, in fact, is the condition of the Moderate support to the Bill. In the third place, with regard to these Budget provisions, our view is that there should be a joint and not a divided purse. We do not think that a joint purse should create all that friction which has been described to you. On the contrary, I believe that the effect of a joint purse would be to promote friendliness and mutual understanding, and would help the scheme. Then we are anxious that so far as the Executive Council is concerned the Montagu-Chelmsford scheme should be given effect to —I am talking only of the by-provinces—namely, that there should be two members of the Executive Council, one of whom should be an Indian, and that the position of the Minister should be of the same status, having the same emoluments as members of the Executive Council, and that his approval with regard to the proposals for taxation should always be obtained. Taxation should be a transferred subject, and in no case should taxation be imposed by or through the Grand Committee. I am confining my remarks to the Report. Then the Report says that there should be Under-Secretaries and Standing Committees both in connection with the Provincial Government as well as the Central Government. We desire that that should be given effect to. That finds no place in the Bill. Then there is a recommendation in the Report to the effect that five years after the first sitting of the Legislative Council an inquiry should be held by the Government of India, either at the instance of the Provincial Legislative Council or of the Provincial Government. We are very keen about that. We find no mention of it in the Bill. I hope it will be provided for in the Rules. These are the observations that occur to me in connection with the Provincial Government. But there is another important matter which I purposely kept back and which I want now to submit, and that is in regard to the Central Government. We desire that there should be some responsibility, not perhaps to the same extent that might be given to the Provincial Government, but that there should be some responsibility even at the start in connection with the Central Government, and we want fiscal autonomy. Unless this is done the very evil which it is designed to obviate in connection with the Provincial Councils and the Provincial Governments, the evil of criticism without responsibility, would be perpetuated. Then, again, there would be agitation for the purpose of getting some amount of responsibility in the Central Government. Then it strikes us that an unreformed Central Government is not exactly a suitable instrument for superintending the work of a reformed Provincial Legislative Council. Therefore it seems to be a natural corollary that there should be a Minister for the purpose of supervising the work of the various Provincial Governments which have been reformed. There is really not much difference in the quality of the work in regard to certain matters, at least between the Central Government and the Provincial Government. It is work very much of the same kind. I am speaking for the Moderate Party when I say that there are certain Departments which seem to us might be transferred at once in connection with the Central Department—for instance, income tax. Sir James Brunyate, in his memorandum, which is appended to the Crewe Report, divides the all-India subjects into two groups. In the first place there are those subjects which he calls the controlled subjects, and, in the second place, there are what he calls the popular subjects. It strikes us as regards the popular subjects that some of them might be placed under the control of a popular Minister. These are the improvements which we should desire to inaugurate in the first instance in the Central Government. Then, coming to the Council of the Secretary of State, we generally accept the Report of the Crewe Committee, subject to one or two reservations, which I will presently mention. One of the reservations is that the number of Indian members should be one-half, instead of a third as recommended. The second reservation is that a Select Committee of the House of Commons upon Indian Affairs should be formed. The Report votes against it. Lastly, in connection with the Statutory Commission which is to be appointed under Section 28 of the Bill, it should be made quite clear that the Commission will not only inquire into the machinery of the Provincial Governments, but also into the machinery of the Central Government. These, I think, are in substance the points which we have ventured to urge. There are others, but these are the principal points which I have summarised, and which we have urged in our Memorandum.

1041. Let us take one or two of those very wide and important points separately. You are anxious to see at the very start a unified form of Provincial Executive, even though there is Diarchy?—Undoubtedly.

1042. And, in order to get that unified Executive as soon as possible, you wish to have the joint purse maintained. That is the main reason why you advocate the joint purse against a separate purse?—That is so. A joint purse, instead of creating friction, seems, to my mind, and to most of the Moderate members—and I think I can speak for all the delegates in this matter—will be an instrument for lessening the friction. I may here point out that in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report attention has emphatically been drawn to the necessity of joint deliberation, not only in regard to finance, but in regard to all matters of administration. I can point to passages, but I think that is not necessary. Unless we have this joint deliberation the tendency of a separate purse will be to widen the breach. If they have a joint purse and joint deliberation, the Ministers will be in a position to acquaint themselves with the reserved branches of administration, and, knowing the difficulties of the reserved branches of administration, they would be in a better position to advise the Legislative Council to pass the Supplies as regards the reserved branches. My own idea is that a seperate purse will create endless difficulties. The Ministers, knowing exactly the position of the reserved subjects, having that intimate knowledge by contact, would be in a position to lay before the Legislative Council the true state of things, and the Legislative Council would be more willing than otherwise to accept the recommendations in connection with reserved subjects.

1043. I want again to divide this subject into two points as I see it. Your first point is that in the Executive it is important that in the Provinces there should be deliberation on all subjects reserved and transferred by a body consisting of two Executive Councillors—or three there may be in certain cases—and the Ministers responsible to the Legislature?—Yes.

1044. And that they should form, as it were, to the outside world, a united Government?—Undoubtedly; a sort of Cabinet, so to speak.

1045. Therefore, on all the reserved subjects the Executive Council would have the advantage of discussion with the Ministers responsible to the Legislature, and on the transferred subjects the Ministers would have the advantage of the experience of the Executive Council?—That is precisely the case.

1046. Now we come actually to finance. You wish to break down as soon as possible the Diarchy, or the Diarchy conception in regard to finance? For instance, take land revenue. I understand that land revenue under the Functions Committee is a reserved subject?—Yes, it has been so decided.

1047. You nevertheless think it is important that in the land revenue—not the administration of land revenue, but the amount of land revenue—that should, to all intents and purposes, be transferred?—Undoubtedly; and I hope it will be transferred. I may just point out that in the Bombay Executive Council there was a discussion as to whether this should be a reserved subject or a transferred subject, and the votes were equal. I am going into the secrets of the Bombay Government, but it is an open secret to which I have no hesitation in referring. In the Executive Council there was a discussion about the land revenue, as to whether it should be a reserved subject or a transferred subject, and the votes were equally divided. I understand that in the Functions Committee the three Indian members voted for this being transferred, and they gave in, I understand, because they believed that after five years the whole thing would be reconsidered, and the possibility that after that period this subject would be removed to the list of transferred subjects.

Chairman.

1048. I do not think we can take as evidence any of the proceedings of these bodies that are not published?—This is published.

Major Ormsby-Gore.

1049. That is the indication, that there is still a good deal of variety of opinion in India among all views with regard to the division of functions proposed by the Functions Committee?—Yes.

1050. Is there anything else in addition to the point you have just made about land revenue that you would like to make, say, with regard to the suggestion that certain subjects which are reserved by the Functions Committee you think should be made transferred by this Committee?—The position of my Committee—and I here speak on their behalf—is that the recommendations of the Functions Committee should be given effect to. That is to say, it is a matter of compromise. We may have our own individual views about a variety of things. For instance, in Bengal there is a Party—and I do not know that I do not sympathise with them—who wanted everything to be transferred. There is that body of opinion. But then this is a matter of compromise which we have arrived at, and I, for my part, am not willing to go back on that compromise. We accept it as a policy which has been definitely determined, and we are anxious to accord our support because we are anxious that the Montagu-Chelmsford scheme should come into operation.

1051. Your view being that your are not out at the present moment to make a perfect constitution, but merely a beginning, with possibilities of development?—Entirely. That is the view of my party, and I am very happy to say that public opinion in India is veering round to that view. May I make one remark with regard to Diarchy, which I should have mentioned before? I have heard it said round this table that it is an altogether novel thing in India, but that is not so. In our municipal institutions—this is a very important fact—we have not only a dual but a triple system of administration which has been carried on without friction of any kind. Take the Calcutta Corporation, which is the largest Corporation in Bengal. We have three co-ordinate authorities, each independent in its own sphere—the Chairman, the Corporation of Calcutta, and the General Committee—each having its own assigned functions, and performing its functions without any interference by the other bodies and without a superintending authority, a co-ordinating authority, which would be different in the case of Provincial Governments. It is the same thing in Bombay. I understand the same provisions have been introduced in Madras; and the Decentralisation Commission in 1908 recommended that this triple system of administration should be introduced into all the larger municipalities. Therefore, when it is said that Diarchy is an altogether novel system, my answer is that we are perfectly familiar with it in the administration of our large towns, and in Bombay it has been in operation for over thirty years, and in Calcutta it has been in force for over twenty years.

1052. With regard to a Diarchy, would you make this point: that part of the Indian Executive remains responsible to the Secretary of State and Parliament here and another part becomes responsible to Indian electors? There must be a division somewhere?—I entirely accept that view.

1053. Then one great question with regard to the composition of the Provincial Executives is that it has been suggested that in the Government of India, in these cases where the Government representative is drawn from the public life in England, he should have two official Executive Councillors in addition to his one Indian Executive Councillor?—I entirely dissent from that view, on my own behalf and on behalf of my party. I will state my reasons—in fact, they can be given in a nutshell. Really the work could be done by the heads of departments, and then the effect of adding to the Executive Councils would be to trench hereafter on the transferred subjects. The result would be that you would have two or three members of the Executive Councils and you would not want Ministers. The certain effect would be to reduce the ministerial element in the Cabinet.

1054. How many Ministers do you imagine there would be in the Cabinet?—Let me take the case of the Province with which I am most familiar, my own Province of Bengal. I expect there would be two Ministers in Bengal. I take it that police, law, and justice will be among the reserved subjects, and that in regard to the other subjects most of them will be transferred. For police, law, and justice you will have two Executive Councillors. Therefore, for the other subjects, which are more numerous, and some of them of the greatest importance from our point of view, for those you will require two Ministers. I take it, therefore, that the Cabinet of Bengal, exclusive of the Governor, will consist of four members. Therefore the Bill provides for four Executive Councillors. Out of them, two will be Ministers and two members of the Executive Council. I think that will be the composition of the Bengal Cabinet.

1055. You are not impressed with the suggestion that in order to train the Ministers you would have to divide portfolios among rather more Ministers, so as to have a separate Minister for Education, Agriculture, and Public Health?—Certainly not, and I will tell you my reasons. Sir Sankaran Nair dealt with Education, Local Government and Sanitation. I think, on the whole, he discharged his duties satisfactorily. Lord Sinha was in charge of two or three Departments. Why should it be laid down as a definite, inexorable principle that a Minister should have only one Department for training? He would then have no work in many cases. Therefore I say that there ought not to be any hard and fast rule of that kind.

1056. Then with regard to this question of Governors, do you share the view that the political responsibility that will be placed upon the shoulders of a Governor when this scheme comes into operation will make it very desirable that the Governors should all have training in political life?—I entirely accept that view.

1057. That is the view which has been widely expressed in India?—Yes. And then I may say, without any disrespect to any class or party, that we have great great confidence in men trained in the public life of England.

1058. You would wish to see in future the Governors of the Provinces, other than the three Presidencies, appointed in the same way, and the same type of men, as in the three great Presidencies?—My answer is emphatically yes. My answer is that we should like to have men trained in the public life of England in all these great appointments.

1059. That is, you would like people appointed to Bengal and Madras, and also to the other Provinces?—That is so.

1060. Would you make any exception, such as in the case of Assam?—It is difficult to answer. I would not make an exception. A Province's resources have to be developed. I would say, with all respect, that the Government has neglected its opportunities of development in regard to many of our Provinces. Therefore, when you are starting us on new careers, with any place we should be in an advantageous position if you gave us Governors from the public life of England.

1061. Then your next main point was with regard to a uniform scheme for the central Government of India. You would not say there was no advance being made?—I would not.

1062. Because surely the fact that you are giving a majority to the Legislative Assembly, and giving that Assembly very considerable powers, does make a great advance on anything that has hitherto existed in India?—That is so, but we want to go further. It is not merely a sentimental matter, but there is a great practical consideration behind it. Here is a Central Government, largely Bureaucratic in its constitution and ideals, presiding over a new Diarchic experiment of self-government in the Provinces. It would be like the lion looking after the lamb.

1063. Surely, even though the Executive remains Bureaucratic, the influence of a Legislative Assembly, which is largely elected, on the character of that Executive will be very great?—I quite admit that. It is an advance.

1064. You admit that Diarchy is not a good thing in itself; it is merely a means to make a beginning?—Quite so.

1065. Would that not be establishing considerable difficulties in the Government of India by dividing the functions of the Central Government?—Unless you have Diarchy now in the Government of India how are you going to have progressive realisation here? In one stage or other you are bound to have Diarchy, whether now or ten years hence. I say when the country wants it now, why not let them have it now? You are not going to give the whole of these Departments at once; it will be by progressive stages. I say begin the process now.

1066. Are you one of those who who think that if any further steps are to be taken now in the progressive direction in regard to the constitution of the Government of India and the Central Legislature, instead of having a Council of State we should have a Senate?—I do not like a Council of State at all; I prefer a Senate. The Council of State is more or less a registering body. That is to say, it is created for a particular purpose, namely, to pass legislation which the Government of India thinks necessary. The Revising Chamber ought to be quite a different thing. I feel positive that people will not have confidence in a Revising Chamber which is also a Registering Chamber.

1067. That is my point really. But if it were that the Government may have a machinery whereby it may get measures passed which it considers essential—as a matter of fact, in regard to the Government of India, it would not—but which the Secretary of State or Parliament should consider essential, it does not debar the consideration of a Senate as well?—No, it does not.

1068. And you would like to see a Senate as an ordinary Revising Chamber established at once, whether there is a Grand Committee or not?—I would not on account of the passing of this Bill. The point is that if there is time to elaborate a system of that kind, it may be done. But India is so expectant, and the conditions are such that I think it would be a great blunder to defer the passage of this Bill on account of devising any machinery of that kind.

1069. Then, with regard to what you said about Lord Crewe's Committee, you agree with that, that what is called the veto of the Council of India should disappear and that the Council of India, whether you call it the Council of India or not, should become really an expert Advisory Committee attached to the Secretary of State to advise?—We entirely support that view.

1070. Whatever you call it. But that you think, with regard to the composition of this new Council of India here, half should be Indian?—Yes.

1071. Do you think that all that half should be selected as the Crewe Committee recommended, namely, from panels from the elected members, or would you leave the Secretary of State to select the difference between the third and the half? They suggested that one-third should be Indians selected from the panel elected by the Legislative Assembly of India?—I do not know that I have followed your question. That is to say, that part should be appointed from the panel and a percentage should be appointed by the Secretary of State?

1072. Yes?—I would agree to that.

1073. You do not ask for more than one-third selected, say, by the Indians themselves?—If there were to be half and half, I would make half and half of them, half of the Indians selected from the panel and half by the Secretary of State.

1074. You have no remarks to make on the recommendations of the Crewe Committee with regard to the previous sanction of the Secretary of State with regard to such matters as the certification of Bills by the Council of State?—I think it is important that the previous sanction of the Secretary of State should be obtained before certification is granted. I would extend that principle further, and say that, with regard to the Governor of the Provinces, the previous sanction of the Government of India should be obtained before certification is granted.

1075. Otherwise you would be inclined to relax the present practice of previous sanction being obtained from the Secretary of State for legislation by the Government of India?—Where there is an agreement between the Government of India and the Legislature I think the sanction should be dispensed with.

1076. That would inevitably mean dispensing with previous sanction, because you could not tell whether the Legislative Assembly would be in agreement with the Government of India?—Whatever the result may be, that is my submission.

1077. Now, you were a member of the Franchise Committee?—Yes; I was.

1078. In your Province of Bengal you have had hitherto practically none of this non-Brahmin difficulty?—None. I may point out that we Bengalees—I am a Brahmin—we Brahmins have been doing our very best to uplift the depressed classes, and I think my friend Lord Sinha is Vice-President of a Society which has been formed by the educated community for the purpose of uplifting the depressed classes, and we work side by side for the purpose of uplifting them.

1079. In Bengal there is not the same division between the Brahmin and the other higher castes as there is in Madras, is there?—Absolutely none. My friend Lord Sinha is of one caste and I am a Brahmin. There is no difference in status between him and myself, and nobody regards the higher non-Brahminical castes in that light. That is the point.

1080. Have you come across the non-Brahmin Movement, as it is now called, outside Madras?—I have travelled all over India, and never seen it anywhere except in Madras.

1081. How old is it in Madras?—Since the discussion about the Montagu-Chelmsford scheme.

1082. Does it date back to a certain famous election, when one of your colleagues on the Franchise Committee defeated Dr. Nair at an election at Madras, where there were non-Brahmin votes predominating, and they voted for the Brahmin and not for Dr. Nair?—Yes; in 1914 we went to Madras, and thousands of Brahmins and non-Brahmins were there, and the Montagu-Chelmsford scheme is dated, I think, July, 1918; so that this is entirely of recent origin, and owing to differences to which you have referred.

1083. Nevertheless, you, and those who think with you, are prepared for the sake of peace to meet the non-Brahmins half-way by giving them reservation of seats seats?—Yes; we are prepared to do that in plural constituencies. If they had come to us for settlement we were prepared to do that.

1084. A great deal has been made in this country of this non-Brahmin question. It is quite untrue to say that the Brahmins in Madras can be compared to what Lord Sydenham said this morning, when he called them the upper classes?—Absolutely.

1085. The Brahmins are very largely poor men?—Very; they are the poorest of the community. In fact, I might just say that it is a sin for a Brahmin to be rich, and our ancient traditions—we have got over the traditions now, but this is absolute truth—are that poverty and learning go together.

1086. Under your proposal in the Franchise Committee only one in ten of the Brahmin population will get a vote?—Yes.

1087. That mere fact shows that under this fairly low franchise a very large number of the Brahmins of Madras will not get votes, whereas a great many of the poor will?—Yes.

1088. And the majority of the voters in Madras will be non-Brahmins?—Undoubtedly.

1089. I understand that it is four to one?—That is the percentage.

1090. And you have no fear that if the non-Brahmins were organised they would get, without any reservation of seats, representation?—Absolutely none. What I fear is that the Brahmins will all go under, because the effect of all this agitation will be to create a sort of combination between the non-Brahmins, which is a good thing, and I am perfectly certain they will capture a large number of seats.

1091. As a member of the Franchise Committee, can you tell us roughly what proportion of the total electorate—of the electorate of 5½ millions—would be illiterate?—Not very large; but it would be difficult to give a definite answer to that.

1092. A vast mass would be literate?—Yes.

1093. There would probably be about a million who are illiterate who would get votes?—About that, I think.

1094. The franchise you propose is lower than a literacy franchise?—Yes.

1095. Can you give me a sort of picture of what this sort of franchise means in a rural community? Take a Hindoo rural village; how many men in an ordinary average village would get a vote?—Not many; but a fair proportion will get a vote. The point is not number of people who will get the vote, but the educative influence of the vote among the villages. I do not suppose five or six men get votes in a village, but the whole village is stirred at the time of an election. The whole village come together, and want to know what the vote means. They will ask, "Whom are you going to vote for; what are your reasons for voting?" It is not the number which is important, but the educative influence of the vote among a vast population. I think this system of election will have a great educational value.

1096. As a mater of fact, in the foundation of the Indian social system you have, in the Indian communities, the village headman?—Yes. We are told that we never had self-governing institutions. But no social question is ever decided except by a Punchayat. The Punch has to be elected, and five or six men meet together, and the whole thing is gone into, and the voice of the Punch prevails. So, in the most vital matters of our social and religious considerations we have a most democratic system amongst ourselves.

1097. In the village the system of election, though it may not be a form of ballot, is understood?—Yes.

1098. In every case the headman of the village throughout India will get a vote under this scheme?—I think so. There is no doubt about it.

1099. There was a question that was put this morning. It was suggested that your franchise is largely a property qualification. Surely it is true to say that as it is a qualification on so much taxation, it is largely an earning-capacity qualification?—Yes. It is also a literary qualification in this sense: that those who pay that tax are mostly literary people.

1100. May I ask your personal views on women's suffrage?—I voted against it, and I will explain my reasons for it. I am a bit of a reformer in my own way. But I am anxious that this scheme should pass without any difficulty of any kind, and I was anxious that the orthodox feeling of the community should be with us. If we had dealt with this point in the spirit of reformers the people might say that they were going to have some new-fangled institution, which would interfere with our social usages and so on.

1101. You think it would be possible to introduce women's franchise in Bombay, and not introduce it throughout India?—I am not of that opinion. We have these differences now. Take, for instance, our municipal institutions. In Bombay, for election to the Corporation the women have a vote. In some of the provinces the women have the municipal vote.

1102. I take it that, at any rate in the first few years, if women were given the vote, very few Mahommedan women would vote, and very few high-class Hindus?—That is so.

1103. And all the Parsee women would vote, and the lower-class Hindus?—Yes; and in Bengal probably those who passed the various examinations.

1104. Have you any remark to make on the suggested composition of the Grand Committees in the Provinces?—It ought to have a bare Government majority. The Government of India says it should consist of 33 per cent. of the Legislative Council. It ought to be representative of all sections of the Legislative Council. If a Bill is passed or if a measure is carried out, it ought to receive the assent of popular opinion.

1105. Do you agree that the sole advantage of having a grand committee system as against carrying the proposed essential measure by ordinance of the Governor, is that the matter should be thoroughly and freely discussed, and that you may be able to get to points of detail?—That is exactly so. Otherwise I should be in favour of ordinance, because then entirely the responsibility would be on the Government.

1106. India's opinion is that it is highly necessary to put most of the onus on the Governor, is it not?—Undoubtedly.

Mr. Spoor.

1107. You have told us that you represent the Moderate Party?—Yes.

1108. I would like to ask you a question about the composition of that party. Is it an elected body, made up of delegates from all over the country?—That is true. We are elected by our Associations.

1109. Have you many associations?—We have several.

1110. In comparison, for example, with the National Congress?—No; we are only of yesterday's growth, and the National Congress, which has been built by us, is of thirty-three years' growth. You cannot expect them to be on the same footing; but we are steadily making headway, and if the Government would enact reasonable measures I think the saner section of the community would be with us.

1111. But at present you cannot claim to represent a very considerable body of opinion, can you?—Considerable! If you use that word, I would say yes. It may not be a considerable body of the politically minded. Take, for example, Bengal. I think the great body of the thinking population of Bengal is moderate.

1112. You were, of course, for many years a very prominent member of the National Congress?—I was one of the founders.

1113. And as far as I have been able to ascertain from your replies to these questions and your answers to Captain Ormsby-Gore, there is very little fundamental difference between your position and that of the Congress?—I am very glad to hear it.

1114. We are wanting to discover some common ground in Indian opinion, and I should like you to tell me if you can what you would regard as the chief points of difference between the National Congress and your own Party with regard to these proposals?—It is difficult for me to say. Perhaps in regard to details there is not much difference of opinion, but the outlook is different. We have from the outset supported the scheme as a definite advance and as marking a definite and substantial stage towards responsible Government. Some would-be leaders of the National Congress have regarded the scheme as disappointing, unacceptable, and unworthy of the British public, etc., unless and until certain fundamental changes were introduced which, which, in our opinion, would have transformed the scheme out of shape. But now they are coming round to our views.

1115. I take it that many of your criticisms of the proposals are very similar indeed to those of the Congress. I do not know whether they are coming to yours or yours are approximating to theirs?—I take it they are coming to ours.

1116. On the question of a time limit. I believe that you yourself also support the incorporation of a time limit?—No, not in that way. Their time limit, as I understood it, was that after a specified number of years, this or that must be done. We do not put it in that way. We say there must be progressive stages, and after five years there should be an inquiry, and then as the result of that inquiry there should be a further advance. But we do not say a fixed five years, and within those five years you must give us so and so. We base it upon qualification. That, I think, is an essential point of difference.

1117. Is it correct that in December, 1917, when the Congress was held, you moved a resolution asking for a statutory time limit?—I do not know that I did. My impression is that I did not, and even if I did I think it is open to me to change my opinions.

1118. I quite agree with you. That is what I wanted to discover, whether you had moved your attitude or not?—I do not remember that I supported a time limit.

1119. With regard to extending the franchise, would your Party like to see the franchise extended to working men by reducing the qualification to, say, an earning power of 150 rupees a year?—It is difficult to answer a question of that kind. Do you say those who get 150 rupees a year should have a vote?

1120. Yes?—Probably they pay taxes, therefore your question would be covered by the concessions already made. Those who earn 150 rupees a year surely must be paying a rupee a year, or something of that kind, and therefore they would get the franchise.

1121. You agree, I take it, that it would be desirable that as large a section as possible of the industrial community should have the franchise?—Yes.

1122. Do you think that under the recommendations of the Southborough Report in urban and rural areas many artizans and business people will get a vote?—Yes, and I will tell you why. Take, for instance, the municipalities of Bengal. We have got one rupee eight annas as the qualifying income. Anybody who pays 2s., we may take it, has a vote, and almost everybody pays it. That is the municipal vote, and that vote we have given in the Franchise Committee's Report to all the people living in the municipalities in Bengal.

1123. Of course, you have just told us in answer to a question by Captain Ormsby-Gore, that poverty and learning go together, as applied to non-Brahmins. I suppose that would apply to other sections of the community as well?—I am talking of the Hindoo community.

1124. Therefore it is desirable that the franchise should be extended as far as practicable?—That is low enough.

1125. When Lord Southborough was giving evidence this morning—you, of course, were a member of the Franchise Committee—he stated that he found no evidence of the existence of a sufficiently well organised labour body to provide adequate representation for Labour?—Yes.

1126. Can you tell the Committee whether, in your opinion, such bodies do exist in India?—My experience is confined to Bengal. I cannot say they do. In Madras it may be different.

1127. You cannot say whether it would have been possible to secure a really competent Labour representation on the Franchise Committee?—My own idea is that competent Labour representation could be obtained upon the present franchise, the present voting power; that is my view.

Lord Sinha.

1128. I think Mr. Spoor's question is with regard to the Franchise Committee, and not the electorate, really?—It was considered in Bombay.

Mr. Spoor.

1129. And I asked Lord Southborough to what extent Labour was represented, but he said Labour had been considered, but it had not been found practicable because there was nobody to whom they could go?—Yes.

1130. You, however, think that Labour opinion could be found?—In Madras perhaps, but not in Bengal.

1131. You have told us just now that your personal view is that the question of women's suffrage should not be pressed because it might jeopardise the present Bill?—Yes. The opinion which ought to support the present measure, the Conservative opinion, which is very large in India, and orthodox opinion would be affected. That is my only objection. It is only a practical objection.

1132. It is not the principle at all that you are referring to. You agree with the principle?—I agree with the principle, but every principle has to be judged by the circumstances of its application.

1133. I asked this morning with regard to the number of women voters who have exercised their right in Bombay during recent years. Have you any idea as to the percentage of women who have exercised their right?—No, in fact I have never inquired into that.

1134. I have been informed that quite a considerable proportion of women have exercised that right?—I have not studied the question or taken the trouble to get the information.

1135. Do you generally approve of the Bill that is before us now?—The Montagu-Chelmsford scheme?

1136. I am talking about the Bill?—We think in some respects the Bill falls short of the scheme.

1137. But you approve of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report?—Yes, subject to what I have just said with regard to the Central Government.

1138. And Lord Southborough told us this morning that he did not find any considerable body of opinion in India that severely criticised the proposal, because the Central Government was not going to be in any sense under control, or the Indian people would have no responsibility in it?—I think the position is this. We should like to have a Central Government with a modicum of responsibility in the Central Government, but we are not prepared to say the scheme is unacceptable, or that we should not be prepared to look at it. If the Montagu-Chelmsford scheme as it is, without any attenuation of any kind, is given to us, although we might not get Central Government now, we, as a party, are prepared to give our support. But there should be no attenuation of any kind.

1139. You think that practically the bulk of opinion in India, both European and native, is in favour of a measure of control and responsibility in the Central Government?—Yes. I can only speak of Indian opinion.

1140. I am glad you told us that, because Lord Southborough said he did not discover that when he was there?—There is a strong body of opinion in favour.

Lord Sinha.

1141. I should just like to ask you this: When you answered Mr. Spoor with regard to Labour opinion on your Committee—the representation of Labour opinion on your Committee, the Franchise Committee—was there any question of obtaining such representation of Labour on your Committee at any place, or was it possible to get it at any place?—In Bombay the question was raised as to whether it would not be possible to give the franchise to the representatives of Labour.

1142. That is just what I am trying to draw your attention to. As I understood Mr. Spoor, the question was not the giving of the franchise to labour, but of getting a labour man to sit as your colleague on your Committee?—No, that question was never raised.

1143. Was it raised in any Province?—Nowhere.

1144. Was it possible to get such representation of Labour on your Committee in the present state of Indian labour?—I do not think so at all: that is my own personal opinion.

1145. It was not considered, anyhow?—No, and the question was never raised, and it was not considered.

1146. Was it suggested by anybody?—It was suggested by none.

1147. I thought you misunderstood Mr. Spoor's question, and that is why I felt obliged to call your attention to it. I just want to ask you a question about the Provincial Executive. You of course remember the Government of India suggesting that where where the Governors are brought out from England there should be two officials and one non-official in the Executive Council—that is, from the public life of England?—Yes.

1148. And the other Provinces are to have Governors, official Governors—that is, Governors of the Service?—Yes.

1149. Would the result of that not be that in every Government the Executive Council would be predominantly bureaucratic or official?—Undoubtedly.

1150. Would that be acceptable to any shade of Indian opinion?—It would be wholly unacceptable.

1151. I find in Sir Sankaran Nair's minute of dissent he says this, on the 5th of March, in paragraph 37: "If there is any demand in which the Associations who have addressed the Secretary of State and the Viceroy and all classes are unanimous, it is in the request they make that half the members of the Executive Councils, both Provincial and Imperial, should be Indians. The Congress and the Moslem League, as well as the Sikhs and the non-Brahmin classes of Madras, want it"?—I quite agree with that.

1152. That that is the demand by all classes in India with regard to both Imperial and Provincial Councils?—Quite.

1153. I want to know if you will agree with what Sir Claude Hill said in answer to the Secretary of State here, before this Committee? The Secretary of State asked him this: "What do you think would be the relative acceptability in India of these three schemes, the scheme of the Joint Report—that is, Mr. Montagu and Lord Chelmsford's Report—or the scheme of the majority of the Local Governments, or the scheme of the Joint Report as amended by the Government of India? Sir Claude Hill's answer was: "I should say that the acceptance would be greatest in the case of the scheme of the Joint Report." Do you agree?—Yes.

1154. Then he said: "In the case of the scheme as amended by the Government of India." Do you agree?—I do not accept either of the two.

1155. Do you agree with Sir Claude Hill that with regard to Indian opinion the relative acceptability is that next to the Joint Report Indian opinion would accept the scheme as amended by the Government of India?—Indian opinion would not accept either.

1156. Do you mean either the scheme as amended by the Government of India or the scheme advocated by the Government?—Absolutely.

1157. They want the Joint Report scheme, and nothing but that?—Yes.

1158. You have been a member of the Legislative Councils, both Provincial and Imperial, for many years?—I was for eight years a member of the Bengal Provincial Council, and for five years I have been a member of the Imperial Legislative Council.

1159. In your experience both as a member of the Council and also during the time when you were not a member of the Council, has there been any single measure, administrative, legislative, or financial, in which the Brahminists or the higher castes as members of Council have advocated any measure contrary to the interests of the lower castes?—Absolutely none.

1160. In any Province?—Absolutely nowhere.

1161. Or in the Central Legislature?—Absolutely not; and I may point out that my friend the Hon. Mr. Ramchunder Rao, of Madras, has prepared a list showing the measures calculated to ameliorate the condition of the non-Brahmins, introduced by Brahmins. It is just the other way. I think those who make suggestions of that kind seem to be oblivious of the fact that Brahmins feel that if there is an advance there must be a corresponding uplift of all the classes. We cannot leave the depressed classes in the position in which they are. We want to bring them all with us. It is perfectly ridiculous, and, from our point of view, suicidal to hold that we should be advancing ourselves and leaving the lower and depressed classes behind. It is absolutely inexpedient from the political point of view.

1162. Is it a fact that free compulsory education, which is being advocated by practically every member of Council, and has been for many years, is primarily for the benefit of the depressed classes and the lower classes?—Yes; and may I point out that if you look at the records of the Congress you will find that year after year we have been urging the Government to take measures for the amelioration of the depressed classes.

1163. Taking Bengal as the Province with which you and I are most familiar, is it the fact that leadership, either political or social, depends, or has depended in the past, in the long long past, upon belonging to the Brahmin or any higher caste?—It does not depend on caste at all. Take Kristodas Pal, he was the political leader of his generation, and he was not a high caste man.

1164. That was many years ago now?—He died in 1884.

1165. And his son is now one of the leaders?—He is a leader of the Calcutta Corporation.

1166. Although the caste to which he and his father belonged is a very low caste?—Yes; then there is the Maharaja Cossinbazar. He is one of our great leaders, and he is not a member of a high caste.

1167. Of Lahore and Calcutta?—Yes.

1168. May I take it that in Bengal, generally, influence and position do not depend on caste at all, but upon education, wealth, culture, and so forth?—Public spirit, self-sacrifice, and so forth.

1169. As in other countries?—As in other countries.

1170. I am not now talking of Madras. Is it the same in the other Provinces?—I think so, because I have come in contact with my countrymen in other Provinces, and the same rule prevails everywhere.

1171. Taking Madras, are there not at the present moment many leaders, political and otherwise, who are non-Brahmins?—Yes. Dr. Nair himself was one of the great leaders of the Congress. In 1914 he was one of the leaders of the Congress movement in Madras.

1172. And there are many non-Brahmins who are leading political people in Madras?—Yes.

Lord Islington.

1173. Speaking of Madras, would you say that the Brahmin as a community on the average had a higher balance of intellectuality than the non-Brahmin?—That is my impression, but I should not like to vouch for that.

1174. You said that you were in favour of the proposal of the Grand Committee, but that it must be a Grand Committee consisting of a bare official majority?—Yes, and fairly representative of the Legislative Council.

1175. I suppose you would qualify the word "bare" by making it an effective majority?—No. That is to say, it ought not to be such a majority as would in any case give the Governor a majority. It should be a bare majority which would enable the Governor to pass only such measures as were acceptable.

1176. Therefore, you do not want the Grand Committee to be regarded as an instrument by which the Governor can effect his purpose and over-ride the decision of the Legislature?—That is so. He ought not to be able to over-ride, but he ought to be in a position to pass any measure which he considers to be necessary, taking a reasonable section of the people with him. That is my position.

1177. Would you be in favour of him being in a position to carry legislation on a reserved subject?—With a bare majority?

1178. I did not ask you as to whether it was with a bare majority, but as to whether you were in favour of his having the power to be able to carry it on a reserved subject?—By the Grand Committee?

1179. No, I did not ask you that; I merely asked you whether you were in favour, in the ultimate resort, of the Governor having the power to carry legislation on a reserved subject?—I do not quite understand. Is it in a certified procedure?

1180. I was not asking the means. I was merely asking you whether you were in favour of his having that power?—I will not say yes or no, because if it is a reasonable measure he ought to have it, and if it is an unreasonable measure he ought not to have it.

1181. But the idea of a reserved subject is this, that it should be retained in the hands of an autocratic Government, is it not?—Autocratic in the sense of being responsible to Parliament.

1182. As regards the proposal, I would like to hear briefly, if you would give an opinion on what I see in the Government of India Despatch in regard to the very important subject of education. The Government of India suggested that education should be divided and partly as regards the secondary it should be made a reserved subject, and the higher side should be reserved. What is your view on that?—I am not in favour of that at all, and I will tell you my reasons. The Franchise Committee, I think, were of opinion that education should not be a reserved subject.

1183. You mean the Functions Committee?—Yes. The Functions Committee were of opinion that it should not be a reserved subject except in the case of the Bengal Government, and the Calcutta University, pending a Bill which is to re-organise the University of Calcutta. The three subjects to which we attach the greatest importance, and we call them in our own way nation-building subjects, are education, sanitation, and Local Government. We want them to be under our control. In the illustrative list in the Montagu-Chelmsford scheme, primary and secondary, are transferred subjects, but not higher education. There is no reason why higher education should not be transferred to us, because that is a matter in which we are deeply interested, and I do think that it ought to be entrusted to our own people.

1184. So that to that extent you take an exception to what you said just now as regards the Joint Report —that it should be given without attenuations?—That is only a matter of compromise.

1185. But you do not want to have anything else? —No.

1186. At the same time you do recognise that the Report is the preliminary to the work of Parliament? —Certainly; but it must be a substantial advance and as soon as possible. That is the message. We understand by substantial advance what is contained in the Report.

1187. One word as regards several questions that have been put to you—I think by Mr. Spoor—in regard to the franchise of parties in the large towns. Would you regard it as important, at the very first commencement of a constitutional system in India, that those who work in the great industrial centres should have a voice in Parliament?—At the very first start?

1188. Yes; have a voice to this extent, that they should be given a vote?—I do not see why they should not if we could arrange for it.

1189. Do you attach importance to it?—It is not a matter of first-rate importance, but I would not exclude them. They are bound to have it by-and-by.

1190. Would you say it would be a means by which they might improve their social and industrial position?—Yes; it would raise their status and self-respect, and help them in the matter of advancing themselves. They would develop a state of civic self-respect. I think that would be helpful to them and to the industries.

1191. Incidentally would it tend towards improving their material condition?—I think so.

1192. Would you set great importance by that?—I do attach importance to it.

1193. May I take it from your answers that you would like to see in regard to the operatives in the industrial centres the machinery of election devised in such a way that the operatives in the industrial centres should have a vote?—If the effect of that would be to postpone the Bill, I say no. Then my next point is, that as a matter of fact a good many of them will have a vote under the franchise that we give them. Most of them will have the vote.

1194. You say most of them will have the vote?—I think so. That is my reading of the situation.

1195. Now one word as regards the Council of State. What would you think of the substitution of ordinance after discussion in Assembly or Legislative Council—for the Council of State, I mean?—

A Council of State would provide for discussion, and the other would not.

Mr. Montagu.

1196. Always after discussion?—I should not seriously object to that unless the Council of State is to be the nucleus of a Revising Chamber.

Lord Islington.

1197. To that extent would you regard it as of importance, even though it might not be a perfect machine at first?—As a Revising Chamber?

1198. Yes?—As at present constituted it is not a Revising Chamber which would command any confidence. Its first business, apparently, is to register the decrees of the Government. The Revising Chamber ought to be an independent body which may, or may not, register the decrees of the Government; to combine the two functions is to cast a slur on the Revising Chamber, and people would say: "This is merely a Registering Chamber, and then they made it a Revising Chamber." A Revising Chamber must be absolutely separate from the idea of a Registering Chamber.

1199. So you would not regard unfavourably a scheme by which, after discussion in Assembly, the ordinance were established as a means by which the Executive could enforce its will?—I have not consulted my friends, but as at present advised that is my personal opinion.

1200. You are anxious that the Central Government should have certain functions in the direction of transferred subjects similar to what you have got in the Provinces?—Yes.

1201. Could you mention one or two of those subjects?—Salt is one, income-tax is another, and I think some might be selected from Sir James Brunyate's note of dissent attached to the Crewe Report. He divides all-India subjects into two groups—controlled and popular. These two are comprehensive enough. Then, further, the Minister may supervise the working of the new scheme in the reformed Councils. That is a very important branch of the work.

1202. One word as regards the Crewe Report. You would like to see the Advisory Committee which is proposed in the Crewe Report half Indian and half European?—Yes.

1203. What is your reason for preferring an Advisory Committee to a Council of India, assuming the Council of India was composed as in the Crewe Report? I mean, I gathered from some answers that you gave just now that you preferred the proposal of an Advisory Committee to the present arrangement of a Council of India?—Yes.

1204. Could you give us reasons why you prefer an Advisory Committee to the Council of India, assuming that the Council of India was constituted as proposed in the Crewe Report?—I fear I do not quite understand the question. Is it that the present proposal is to make the India Council advisory?

1205. Yes, which is different, of course, to the present statutory Council?—It is advisory except in the matter of finance. I think that is the present constitution.

1206. There are differences which we need not go into?—Well, my reason is this, that it stands between the responsibility of the Secretary of State and Parliament, just a halfway house towards its ultimate abolition. That is the view I take of it.

1207. That is why you like the Advisory Committee? —Yes We aspire to the position of a self-governing Dominion. They have not got any Council of the kind.

Die Martis, 29° Julii 1919.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Marquess of CREWE.
Earl of SELBORNE.
Lord BRODRICK (Viscount Midleton).
Lord ISLINGTON.
Lord SINHA.
Mr. BENNETT.
Sir HENRY CRAIK.
Mr. MONTAGU.
Major ORMSBY GORE.
Sir J. D. REES.
Mr. SPOOR.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE EARL OF SELBORNE IN THE CHAIR.

THE HONOURABLE BABU SURENDRANATH BANERJEA, is recalled; and further Examined, as follows:—

Sir J. D. Rees.

1208. You have been a member of a Provincial Legislative Council and the Imperial Legislative Council, and you have also been President of the National Congress?—Yes. I have been twice President of the National Congress. I was eleven years in the Provincial Legislative Council Executive. I said eight years yesterday; I made a mistake.

1209. Is the chief objection raised to these reforms the appointment of Ministers and the transfer to them of certain subjects, and is the objection raised that it is a transfer to an oligarchy, and not really to the people of India?—That is an objection which I have heard.

1210. It is one of the chief objections?—Yes—not by ourselves.

1211. But I mean amongst the objectors?—Yes.

1212. Therefore caste and communal representation are vital issues in this matter?—Yes.

1213. Are not the Brahmins people of India like other Indians, and their natural intellectual leaders?—I think so.

1214. Is not caste a difficult, and to some extent a local, question, requiring experience?—Undoubtedly.

1215. Would you say that a Civil Servant who had served for twenty years in the Telagu districts of Madras, on the Coromandel Coast, and for five years on the Malabar Coast, and was an interpreter in two of the three languages, had had special opportunities of studying this question?—Undoubtedly; most certainly.

1216. I beg leave to ask Mr. Banerjea a few questions from that platform, Mr. Chairman. Passing over questions I asked from others, which were repeated to you yesterday, one question was put to you. You were asked is it not the case that there is not the same division between Brahmins and others in Bengal as exists in Madras?—I was asked that.

1217. I think it was by Major Ormsby Gore. Do you know that the division does exist in Madras, of your own knowledge?—No, I do not.

1218. You said, I think, that there was no oppression by higher castes of lower castes in Bengal, of your own knowledge?—That is so.

1219. Have you any knowledge that it exists in Madras?—No personal knowledge at all.

1220. I think you said that you were willing, on account of this alleged oppression, to give the non-Brahmins in Madras 30 out of 60 seats?—I did not say so.

1221. I am glad to take it from you. I thought you said you were willing to meet the Government of India in that matter, because it is the Government of India which has proposed that, as I understand?—No, I did not say that at all.

1222. You would not do it?—No.

1223. You would not disqualify the fittest in favour of the less fit?—That is so.

1224. Is not communal representation for 90 per cent. of the population a contradiction in terms? It is not what we understand by communal representation, is it?—I agree with you.

1225. It is not?—No.

1226. Can you say that castes and classes which were so articulate as to make pathetic appeals—I am quoting Lord Sydenham—to bodies in England were inefficiently organised and too poor to make its voice heard at its own door in Madras?—I should not think so at all.

1227. Throughout the examination which you underwent yesterday the word "protection" was continually used. Let me quote Lord Sydenham. He said, "The object is to secure protection by communal representation for those whose pathetic protests Mr. Montagu ignored." That was in a letter to the Times. Perhaps I ought not to have quoted it, and I withdraw it, but "protection" was used, and Lord Southborough used the words "special resolution," and somewhere in your evidence yesterday the word was used—"communal representation is necessary to protect the masses against the upper classes." May I ask you if that is a correct picture of Hindoo society? Is it really a state of things in which the vast majority are needing perpetual protection against a small minority?—It is not so at all. There is a tendency in some quarters to make a fanciful line of cleavage between the masses and the educated community. The educated community are the natural protectors of the masses, and I desire to emphasise that fact. If you look at the proceedings of the Indian National Congress from the time of its inception in 1885 until its most recent sitting you will find that every year a number of resolutions were introduced, and have been unanimously adopted, for the purpose of inviting the Government to take measures for the amelioration and improvement of the masses. We are the natural protectors of the masses, and have always been so, because they are our people—the bone of our bone and the flesh of our flesh, as I said in one of my speeches. Therefore, there is no question of protection at all.

1228. I have asked another witness, and we got it quite clearly, that the Brahmins, so far from being rich, are by no means the rich amongst the people of India?—Everywhere that it so; in Bengal, too.

1229. Since you do not know of your own knowledge in Bengal of any upper and lower caste feud then you cannot say, not knowing Madras, that it exists there; you merely took it on paper from what you heard. When did you first hear of this root antagonism between the upper and lower castes, between Brahmins and non-Brahmins?—After the promulgation of the Montagu-Chelmsford scheme.

1230. Is it an entirely new thing?—Absolutely new to my knowledge.

1231. Would it be posible that it could have reached the stage it has unless it had some financial backing?—Certainly not.

1232. Is it the case that rich Zemindars and titular Maharajahs and Rajahs of Madras—I say titular with an object—are non-Brahmins as a rule?—That is my information.

1233. It is correct. Is it probable, or do you know, that they finance a movement with which ostensibly they are connected, supposing the castes were divided in this way?——

Chairman.] I do not think you must ask if it is probable; ask if it is the case.

Sir J. D. Rees.

1234. Is it the case? Do you know that the non-Brahmin Zemindars finance the anti-Brahmin case?—I have heard it.

1235. You do not know it?—I have no personal knowledge.

1236. Is it the fact that this movement is closely connected with Nair management—management by the Nair caste?—That is what I have heard.

1237. Was Dr. Nair the secretary?—He was the leader.

1238. I do not know his real name, but he is so called here. Of course, that means nothing. It merely means his caste name?—Yes; he was the leader.

1239. Have you any knowledge of the position of the Nair caste?—All I know about the Nair caste is that they are non-Brahmins, and that they live in Malabar.

1240. Are you aware that they have actually for the purposes of this agitation been classed as a depressed class?—No, I have never heard that.

1241. It would astonish you, perhaps?—Yes.

1242. What is the greatest office in India open to Indian gentlemen?—A member of the Viceroy's Executive Council.

1243. Is that held by Sir Sankaran Nair?—It was.

1244. Is he a member of this caste?—Yes.

1245. Was he a judge of the High Court in Madras, of his own Province, before he became a member of the Executive Council of India?—Yes.

1246. Do you know the Malabar Coast?—I have read of it.

1247. Do you know that Sir Sankaran Nair was the author of the Malabar Marriage Act?—No.

1248. Do you know anything about that Act?—No.

1249. You do not know it curtailed certain privileges of Brahmins in favour of Nairs?—I do not know that.

1250. Do you know that the Nairs were once the military aristocracy of the Malabar Coast?—Yes.

1251. Do you know they are at present the landed aristocracy of the coast?—They are an influential and powerful body.

1252. Are they the most influential and most powerful body on the south Malabar coast?—That is my information.

1253. I ask you that as an ex-resident in Travancore and Cuchin. You do not know it?—No, personally I have no knowledge.

1254. Do you think it would be possible to grade those people as belonging to the depressed classes?—I think it would be an absolute misuse of terms.

1255. You were questioned also about the position of the Mahrattas and communal representation for the Mahrattas?—Yes.

1256. Are they a depressed class?—I do not think so.

1257. Were they the actual rulers of India before the English supplanted them?—Yes.

1258. Is that a characteristic of a depressed class?—I should not think so.

1259. Do you think that India's troubles are due to caste?—I think they have been vastly exaggerated and magnified. It is an ancient institution which was found necessary owing to economic exigencies. It has survived its uses. It is there in a more or less vigorous state in the different Provinces. Its influence is on the wane, and I hope that in the course of time, with legislation given to us—social legislation is what we want—it will gradually disappear.

1260. You want it to disappear?—We want it to disappear.

1261. "We" or "I"?—We, the Brahmins and the educated classes. They want it to disappear so that we will all be brought on the same social level and work out our common destinies together.

1263. Caste equality?—Not exactly—equality of social status. If caste stands in the way of equality of social status we desire its disappearance.

1264. Does caste now stand in the way of social status?—Not in Bengal.

1265. Do you know that it does elsewhere?—I cannot speak of other Provinces.

1266. It does not stand in the way of social status so far as you know?—No; not in Bengal.

1267. Then why do you desire it to disappear?—Because it is always being brought forward by our critics as an argument against our political advancement.

1268. Would you destroy a good institution because it formed a weapon for your critics—if you thought it was good?—It was good at one time, but its utility is disappearing in view of the new conditions, and we want to adapt ourselves to altered conditions and altered circumstances because there must be change and growth.

1269. Have you good reason for supposing that you represent the views of the Brahmins in what you have just said?—The educated classes, I think I do.

1270. Is caste more predominant in South India than in other parts of India?—That is my information; that is what I have been told.

1271. And more and more predominant the further south you go?—That is what I have heard.

1272. Is it commonly believed that it reaches its apex, or rather that it has been preserved more in Travancore than anywhere else in India?—That is what I have heard.

1273. What is the present Brahmin predominance which excites this jealousy? Did you read a speech by the Maharajah of Mysore, who is a non-Brahmin prince?—Yes.

1274. Did you read his anwer to a deputation objecting to Brahmin predominance in Mysore, and the fact that they held most of the appointments?—I cannot say that I have. Might I inquire when it was delivered?

1275. I should think it was late last year?—I do not remember it.

1276. Do you think that such predominance as the Brahmins enjoy is due to their natural intellectual superiority and other gifts?—Undoubtedly.

1277. That is what the Maharajah of Mysore said?—There is no doubt about it.

1278. Do you agree with the Maharajah in thinking that it would be unjust to penalise any class because it had been pre-eminently capable of availing itself of the opportunities of education given by British rule?—I entirely agree with the Maharajah.

1279. You have heard it said that Brahmins are a priestly caste, and the word priestly tyranny has been used: On such occasions as when the Brahmin is a priest, which is, of course, rare, is he a powerful person?—Not very; not more than other priests in other countries.

1280. Is not he much less a village priest than other priests?—Each caste has its own priest.

1281. May I ask you a question on page 9 of Lord Southborough's Report on Franchise? This says, "The case for the non-Brahmins rests on the assertion that the Brahmins, though numerically a small community, occupy, not only for religious and social reasons, but also on account of their exceptional educational qualifications, a position of preponderating influence." Do you think it is true that they exercise for religious and social reasons a preponderating influence?—No, not on account of their priestly character, but by reason of their intellectual eminence and their public services.

1282. Have you seen a note to which Lord Sydenham referred yesterday in examining a witness by Sir Alexander Cardew, a member of the Government of Madras?—I heard that.

1283. Does he say this: "The Brahmins undisputed superiority in intellect is one of the most remarkable features of the situation in southern India"? He says under British rule this intellectual predominance has been made more than ever clear. Is that because of greater opportunities of education?—And the greater aptitude of Brahmins to avail themselves of those opportunities. The greater adaptability of the Brahmins is the one striking feature of Brahminism, and that has preserved its character. We adapt ourselves to circumstances when we find the circumstances are changing. Take, for instance, Bhuddism. Bhuddism was the predominant religion. Brahminism crushed that religion out of existence in its fraternal embrace by adapting itself to the new conditions.

1284. Sir Alexander Cardew goes on to say, "The Mohammedans use the Brahmins to a considerable extent." Did not the Mahrattas when they governed India?—Yes.

1285. Have not the English?—Undoubtedly.

1286. Do you think that a member of a Government who considers undisputed superiority in intellect as a reason for exclusion from office has rather lost sight of his subject?——

Chairman.] I do not think you have any right to say that that was Sir Alexander Cardew's view. He does not say that.

Sir J. D. Rees.] I will drop it in a moment if you wish. He says what I quoted: "His undisputed superiority in intellect is such;" and when Lord Sydenham was asked yesterday what does he, Sir Alexander, propose in place of these reforms, Lord Sydenham did not answer that Sir Alexander says there is no sound basis for democratic institutions, and such a scheme will not guarantee ordered progress, and he suggests as a remedy a dropping of the reform.

Chairman.] That is quite a different proposition.

Sir J. D. Rees.

1287. Then I leave it. I regret if I exceeded. Is there hostility to the Brahmins, even amongst the lowest castes?—In Bengal, none.

1288. You do not know the Pariahs of the south and their position?—I have no personal knowledge.

1289. Does not communal representation perpetuate caste and class division?—It is calculated to do so.

1290. Do you approve of giving communal representation to native Christians?—We did it in the case of Madras with great reluctance. As a Committee we were not in favour of communal representation, but we gave it as a sort of transitional arrangement so that in the course of time public spirit would be developed amongst these communities, and they would see fit to coalesce with the rest of India for the purpose of forming a united nation.

1291. Is the giving of representation justifiable on the ground put forward somewhere here that it will tend to break down caste institutions?—I should like to have the exact words. As I was a member of that Committee, and I had a responsibility in the words used, I should like to see those words.

1292. For the moment you have not that in your mind?—No.

1293. Rather than delay the Committee I will leave it. You were asked questions about the franchise for women. Do you think it would be possible to give that franchise to Bombay women and to deny it to Madras women?—My own idea is that there would be a difficulty. I should not say that it would be impossible, but I should not like to see these differences instituted between Province and Province in a matter of such vital importance.

1294. As regards the difficulty of their voting would there be any difficulty in having female polling clerks?—There would be a difficulty in northern India, where we observe the Zenana system. I do not know whether there would be in southern India. There would be the difficulty in the matter of identification.

1295. Is the Zenana system observed in northern India even among the lower castes and the poor?—To some extent amongst those who call themselves respectable, and the poor man when he has money calls himself respectable.

1296. Is it not only amongst those who have money, and claim to be rather better than their neighbours, that the purdah is adopted by the Hindus?—It is a matter of degree.

1297. As regards the residential qualifications, is it not the case that it would be quite easy to acquire a little land, and to build a little house, seeing the cheapness of land and building materials and the joint family system? Would not it be extremely easy for anybody to satisfy the residential qualification?—Undoubtedly, and that was in our mind in broadening that residential qualification.

1298. Would not it be evaded everywhere by erecting a lodge in a garden of cucumbers anywhere?—I think so.

1299. As regards literacy, you objected to that as a qualification. Is it the case that the average ryot, though not literate, is an exceedingly sensible man, who minds his own business and thoroughly well understands it?—I entirely agree with that view, and I may point this out, that Sir George Birdwood, than whom I do not think there has been a greater authority upon Indian matters, says an Indian peasant is as capable as the most cultured peasant in any part of the world, for the simple reason that he is the inheritor of the ancient traditions and the culture of his race. I have come in contact with Indian peasants, absolutely illiterate, capable of efficiently managing their own affairs. May I point out that some of the greatest men in Asia have been illiterate, and yet they have managed empires, founded states, and governed kingdoms without any difficulty whatsoever. There are many examples of that. Such as Akbar, the real founder of the Moghul Empire; Sivaji, the founder of the Mahratta Empire; Hyder Ali, who established the Kingdom of Mysore; and Jung Bahadur of Nepal.

1300. As regards labour, you were asked questions by Mr. Spoor. Do you admit that labour quâ labour is not now represented in your scheme?—Perhaps not quâ labour, but we take it that having regard to the franchise we have fixed it sufficiently low. A large number of labouring-class artisans will get a vote. Labour as a distinct class, perhaps, is not represented, but the labourers will have influence and will have voting powers in the constituencies.

1301. Can you use labour in the sense in which my hon. friend used it? Is it applicable in that sense to India?—I hardly think it is, not in the Province from which I come. It may be in other Provinces.

1302. Is it the case that the average small cultivator, who is himself a labourer, works his farm?—Undoubtedly that is so.

1303. Could you say that labour was not represented when the ryot—who is 80 men out of every 100—is a labouring man?—I agree.

1304. And his representation is specially provided for as a property owner?—I entirely agree.

1305. Is there the material in India for trade union organisation and conception of labour conditions?—There may be in other parts of India, but certainly not in Bengal.

1306. There is some industrial labour in Calcutta?—Yes, in the mills round about Calcutta.

1307. Would not he receive representation under the property qualification, which you suggest?—Most certainly, through municipalities. I live close to them and I know the conditions. They are grouped into municipalities. Under the Franchise a man who pays one rupee eight annas a year is a voter. That is a very low Franchise, and almost every man pays that.

1308. As regards the Mohammedans and their representation, it was stated yesterday by Lord Sydenham, in asking a question, that the Moslem League represents a small body of Mohammedans. Do you consider that proved?—I do not think so.

1309. Do you know the authority for it?—No; I do not know that there is any authority for it. I may mention this. Since the promulgation of the Montagu-Chelmsford scheme, a certain number of associations have sprung up, with a view to press forward the claims of certain sections of the Mohammedan community; but my own reading of the situation is that the Moslem League is the Association of cultured Mohammedans, and of their following, which constitutes the majority.

1310. As regards the Mohammedans of Bengal, where, I understand, they are largely converted Hindoos, have they the zeal of converts, or do they remain very much Hindoo in their habits, with Hindoo interests?—They are practically Hindoos, except in regard to religious matters.

1311. Does that bear upon their representation and the recommendation of the Government of India that it should be increased in Bengal?—There is no reason why it should be increased.

1312. Does it bear upon it?—Yes.

1313. Is it proved that more representation is not required in Bengal than is assigned by your Committee?—I have the figures with me. If you will permit me, I will read them out. We examined in Bengal the Central National Mohammedan Association. They repudiated the Lucknow compact. We examined the representative of the Decca Mohammedans. That was the point raised by the Government of India. They say the Mohammedans of East Bengal would be thoroughly dissatisfied with the arrangement which had been proposed as to the Franchise. The fact is, that that we examined the representative of the East Bengal Mohemmedans before the Franchise Committee, and he adheres to the compact, and he represents the Mohammedans of Eastern Bengal in the Bengal Legislative Council. So that the authoritative spokesman of the Mohammedans of East Bengal, on whose behalf this claim is put forward, supports the Lucknow compact. I submit, the Government of India overlooked that fact entirely.

1314. Is not there a great and absolutely crucial difference between the Mohammedan who speaks more or less Persian and Arabic, and the Mohammedan who is a converted Hindoo?—The fact of the matter is, the language of the Mohammedans in Bengal is Bengali (our language), and their institutions are our institutions, and their customs are practically ours. There is absolutely no difference between the Hindoos and the Mohammedans in these respects.

1315. Do not you think there is a serious misunderstanding of the position in this recommendation?—Yes, undoubtedly, so far as Bengal; I speak with the firm conviction that there is an absolute misapprehension of the whole situation.

1316. Upon the point of duality has India, ever since the days of the Board of Control and the Court of Directors, been a classic case of duality?—Yes. I pointed out yesterday that in some of our municipal institutions we have duality.

1317. That being so, is the objection to duality now raised to a new duality or to a duality of which half will be Indian?—Whatever the nature of the objection may be, it seems to me that without this duality it would be absolutely impossible to give effect to the message of the 20th August, 1917, and what is more, if at this moment you withdraw the dual system it would be interpreted as the Bengal Government says, and if you will permit me I will read the note. It says it will be interpreted as a breach of faith by the people of India.

1318. Do you know why such a simple thing as placing part of the busines with which Indian gentlemen are most capable of dealing in their hands is called by the dreadful name of diarchy? Have you ever discovered the reason?——

Chairman.] We have Mr. Banerjea's quite clear evidence on this point. We have no doubt as to his opinion.

Sir J. D. Rees.] I will leave it. But I was leading up to this. You shall judge if it is material——

Chairman.] I only suggest we have not time to ask the same witness the same questions twice.

Sir J. D. Rees.

1319. That is so. I am sorry; I tried to avoid it. I will leave that then. (To the Witness.) Is it the case that the development of India in the last 10 years, and particularly in the last five, has occurred with such rapidity that the whole situation has altered?—I have no doubt in my own mind about it at all. In the words of the Prime Minister, we are passing through the track of centuries. The fact of the matter is, that India has felt fully and completely the impact of present-day forces.

1320. Would you retain the existing law—the previous sanction of the Government of India being necessary for any Bill affecting religious usages and the rights of the people?—What you would call religious? Do you mean Bills regulating charitable endowments? Would you require the sanction of the Government of India for that? In Bengal we have religious charitable endowments, and the proceeds of those endowments are now wasted, and we have been trying our best for the last 20 years to regulate them. They used to be regulated formerly by the Government, but under an Act of 1861—due to the pressure of Exeter Hall—the control was withdrawn.

1321. Do you think it is necessary? I fear I am getting into trouble on the length of your replies. Would you, or would you not, retain the existing law in that behalf?—I would not. I would give full liberty to the Provinces to determine this question, because they have the amplest materials before them.

1322. Are the difficulties of a joint purse in the Provinces between the two halves of the Government any greater or of a different character from those which used to occur in the Governor-General's Council when we were members in the allocation of funds between the Central Government and the Provincial Government?—My own idea is those difficulties were much more serious than the new arrangement.

1323. You do not think the wrangle would be a serious one?—No. When men sit together and in a friendly spirit to discuss public questions the spirit of wrangling disappears.

1324. Were not we expected to wrangle in that behalf when we represented Provinces on the Council? We were expected to wrangle?—There is this fact to be borne in mind, that if by wrangling anything happens to the detriment of the public interest there is the Parliamentary Commission and the Minister will always have that in his mind, that whatever he says will be raked up against him and the scheme later on.

1325. Would not it lead to serious delay to wait now for the provision of a direct electorate for the Council of State?—Yes, it would.

1326. Is not that greatly to be deprecated?—Very much so.

1327. Do you think the Government of India can get along without a professional lawyer among its members, in view of the fact that it has Law Officers?—I think there should be a professional lawyer, but he need not be a barrister.

1328. You think there ought to be?—Yes; but he need not be a barrister. He may have Indian qualifications.

1329. Something was said yesterday about the procedure of the House of Commons under which the House can reduce but cannot raise provisions in the Budget. There is no such procedure provided here, is there?—We are in a difficulty with regard to the provisions of this Bill. Paragraph 256 of the Report says that the resolutions passed by the Legislative Council will be binding upon the Government in regard to the Budget, save and except on reserved subjects which might be certified by the Governor. That is not provided for in the Bill at all. We have got some sort of a procedure of the House of Commons, but that seems to me to be a restricted procedure, though it may be a procedure of the House of Commons, so far as we can make out.

1330. Is the income voted by the Legislative Council?—It is not voted under the Bill, but at the present moment any member of the Legislative Council is at liberty to move any resolution on the Budget whether as regards income or as regards expenditure. For instance, I may say that a sum allotted to building under the reserved fund may be transferred to the popular department, but under clause 9 of the Bill you are not permitted to do it.

1331. Do you think the Ministers should be a separate and corporate entity like the Executive Council?—I do not follow the question.

1332. They are rather isolated under the scheme. Do you think they should have the same nexus between them as the Executive Councils have?—Undoubtedly, but there is a nexus because they deliberate in common, the Executive Council and the Ministers; they jointly deliberate and jointly consider matters. Therefore, there is that nexus.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

1333. What period do you consider is an ideal period for a review of these decisions by a statutory commission?—I may here point out we are strongly in favour of the five years' recommendation that was made in Montagu-Chelmsford scheme. If you refer to the Report you will find that five years after the first meeting of the Council the Government of India, at the instance of the Provincial Legislature or the Local Government shall inquire as to any addition to the transfer from reserved subjects to transferred subjects. That we do not find here, and I think five years should be the limit, for this reason: Some of our suggestions were made—I am talking as a member of the Franchise Committee—on the basis that there would be a periodical revision after five years, and then the Functions Committee make it quite clear that in regard to at least one important branch, namely, Land Revenue, which is now a reserved branch branch. Their view would have been different, if, instead of five years, the period of ten years had been fixed.

1334. You do not think a business which has already been more than two years under discussion will immediately be re-discussed with a view to the five years' term? If you fix so short a time as five years, will not the business which has been already two years under discussion be carried on with an eye to the review of it?—I do not think so. There will be a feeling of disappointment if the period is made longer. The five years was granted, and there was a prospect of a transfer of the reserved subjects to the transferred subjects in five years. That is the point. We expected that after five years, if we do our business properly, there would be a transfer, and if that is postponed to ten years there would be a sense of disappointment. We are most anxious that this should be inserted either in the rules or in the Bill itself, namely, five years after the first meeting of the Council. A prolonged period of no change would intensify the popular demand.

MRS. ANNIE BESANT, is called in; and Examined as follows:—

Chairman.

1335. I think you are President of the National Home Rule League?—Yes.

1336. You have been good enough to send us in a memorandum and also answers to our questions?—Yes. (For Memorandum see Appendix B.)

The following are the questions and answers:—

1. (a) Do you accept the proposition that it is desirable to bring about the progressive realisation of responsible government in India? and (b) if so, how do you define the expression "responsible government"? (c) And do you generally accept the proposition contained in the Preamble?—(a) Yes. (b) A "Responsible Government" is one which is responsible to—that is, holding office at the pleasure of—a wholly elected Legislative Chamber. (c) Preamble. I accept the progressive realisation of responsible government, i.e., realisation by successive stages, not because I admit that India has no inherent right to Home Rule or is incapable of complete Home Administration, but because time is needed to prepare efficient Home Defence against invasion—a necessary concomitant of complete Home Rule—and also, as a question of expediency, it is wise to conciliate contrary opinion, to effect by compromise that which otherwise might arouse dangerous conflict of opinion and increase racial antagonism, a catastrophe to be avoided by all legitimate means. I would insert after the word "gradually" (line 3 of Bill) "by substantial stages to be completed within a statutory time limit." (Lines 5 to 10 of Bill.) Yes, provided that independence of the Government of India is accompanied, step by step, with the responsibility of the Provinical Government to the Legislature.

2. Do you think that the realisation of responsible government in the Provinces involves the establishment in Provincial Legislatures of a substantial elected majority (Clause 6)?—Yes. I submit with this (p. 5, Memorandum), Sec. (Clause) 6 (1), reserving other points to the answer to Question 19.

3. (a) Do you think that the non-official members of the Provincial Legislatures should possess power to control the actions and policy of the executive? (b) Do you think they possess such power at present?—(a) Yes. But having accepted realisation by stages, and diarchy in this first stage, I must accept the fact that certain subjects are reserved, and are therefore outside legislative control. This concession makes it necessary to insist on joint discussion on all subjects between the Executive Councillors and the Ministers, that is by the whole Executive Government. I should be content to rely during this first stage on the increasing influence of Ministers backed by the Legislature, rising more and more into actual, though not nominal, control, thus preparing for the complete control in the Provinces, at the end of the first five years, indicated as possible in the Joint Report, para. 260. (b) No. They only possess the power of making what the Report calls "irresponsible criticism," and this has been the subject of repeated complaint by non-official members, as giving to Council debates a sense of futility and unreality.

4. Do you think that there are certain matters or functions of government in the Provinces in which at present the Provincial Executive must remain responsible to the Secretary of State and Parliament, and must therefore be in a position to enforce its wishes?—Having accepted diarchy, I admit the necessity of the Provincial Executive Council remaining responsible to the Secretary of State and to Parliament for reserved subjects, and therefore of supplying an instrument whereby its decisions may be enforced.

5. If you accept the propositions stated under Questions 1 to 4, do you think that the dual form of government embodied in the Bill is the best means of securing them? If not, what are your objections to that feature of the Bill, and by what other means would you attempt to secure the objects in view?—Having taken a large part during the year 1916 in the formulation of the scheme known as the Congress League Scheme, finally accepted by the Indian National Congress and the All-India Muslim League in their respective annual meetings in the December of that year, I naturally prefer it to the dual form of government embodied in the Bill; it was based on the precedents afforded by the Colonies in their attainment of self-government through the stage of an irremovable executive and a representative Legislature, and while none of these was nominally aimed at responsible government, they all rendered it inevitable by a process of natural and continuous growth. But since the above-named representative bodies have after long discussion accepted the principle of diarchy as embodied in the Joint Report, to embark on a new scheme would mean mischievous delay, and such delay would cause much resentment in India. In order to avoid this resentment, and the keen disappointment of the hopes raised by the Declaration and the Joint Report—on which the Government of India and the Local Governments were fully consulted before its issue—it is necessary that the Bill should embody all important proposals in the Report, and should also embody some further modifications, as given—in order to avoid repetition—in Answers to Questions 7-10.

6. If you have any other method to suggest, does it (1) provide possibilities of advance by stages and facilitate the "progressive realisation of responsible government," and, if it does, in what way? (Clause 2, 3, etc.) (ii) Does it afford means of judgment (a) to the electors, and (b) to the Statutory Commission which is to examine and report on progress, of the success or failure in results of the control exercised by the legislature and those who represent it in the executive?—I do not propose any other method than that of the diarchy embodied in the Bill, and have therefore nothing to say on (i), or on (ii) (a). (ii) (b) I deal with under Question 17.

7. If you consider a dual form of government acceptable in principle, are there any points of detail the modification of which you regard as necessary? If so, what are those points, and what modifications would you suggest?—Yes. First: it is eminently necessary that the Joint Report should not be whittled down in the Bill; second: certain modifications should be introduced. Under the first come: (1) The transference of additional subjects at the end of five years on the application of a Province. (Para. 260, p. 211.) (2) The voting of the Ministers' salaries should be transferred to the Council. (Ibid.) (3) Insertion in Clause 4 (1) that one Executive Councillor should be an Indian. (Para. 218.) (4) The restoration in Proviso, Clause 9, (a) (b) of the Budget proposals in para. 256, 257. (I withdraw on p. 5 of the Memorandum, Proviso (c) (d), inserted in error.) (5) Insertion in Clause 21 (1) of the provision to "increase

"increase the Indian element" in para. 272, if No. 5 of the proposed modifications be rejected. (6) The insertion in Clause 1 (3) of the word "bare" before the word "majority" in line 3 (para. 253). Under the second should come as a paramount necessity: (1) A real control of the Budget by both Provincial and Central Councils by making the resolutions of the Legislature binding in the decrease of reserved subjects' allotments where they carry out a majority vote in the Executive Government, after discussion as a whole, except where the Governor or Governor-General certifies that the proposed vote is necessary for peace, order, or the defence of the country, for foreign affairs or for carrying out relations with Indian Princes. (2) The grant of financial autonomy. (3) The introduction of diarchy into the Central Government. (4) The removal of the sex disqualification. (5) The appointment of half the Governor-General's Executive Council from among Indians. (6) The non-establishment of a Council of State. Of less importance, but eminently desirable: (7) That the Joint Committee shall lay down fully and precisely the policy to be followed in the Rules (Clause (1)) and that they shall be subject to the positive procedure of the pool. (8) That Proviso Clause 1 (2) shall be omitted. (9) That Clause 46 (3) of the Principal Act referred to in Clause 2 (2) shall be cancelled, and the power vested in Parliament only. (10) That (Clause 3 (1)) a Minister's salary shall be same as that of an Executive Councillor in the same Province, so as to ensure equality of status. (11) That on Clause 5 (2) I beg to refer to pp. 4, 5 of Memorandum under same head.

8. In particular, do you think—(i) that Ministers should hold office "during pleasure"—i.e., should be liable to removal if they are unable to support the action decided upon in their Department by the Governor, or if they fail to retain the confidence of the Legislature? (Clause 3 (1).) (ii) That the Governor should have power to disregard the opinion of his Ministers if he considers that action in accordance with that opinion is inconsistent with the due discharge of his responsibilities? (Clause 3 (3).) (iii) That the Executive Council should in all Provinces normally consist of one official European and one non-official Indian? (Clause 4). (iv) That the Governor should have power to dissolve his Legislative Council? (Clause 7 (4)?—(i) Yes. (ii) Yes. But frequent disregard would give rise to a serious position and great discretion should be exercised. (iii) Yes. (iv) Yes, if in Clauses 7 (1) and 17 (2) the words be inserted "provided that the intervals between the sessions do not exceed four months."

9. Referring back to Questions 2, 3 and 4, if your answers to the first and third of these are in the affirmative, and if you think that the Legislatures should be given great powers of control and influence than they possess at present, do you regard the limitations imposed generally by Clause 9 of the Bill upon their financial and legislative powers as—(i) suitable, or as (ii) unnecessarily severe, or as (iii) inadequate to safeguard the responsibilities which the Government owes in the last resort to Parliament (Clause 9)?—I regard Clause 9, Proviso (a) and (b) as unnecessarily severe, and refer to 7 (1) and (2) under "Second." I object to Grand Committees—Clause 9 (3) (4) (5)—as an undue interference with legislation and reducing Council debate to the position it now occupies. Clause 9 (b) should omit the power to appoint persons to preside by rule, and the statute should give the power of election of President and Vice-President of Councils and Assembly to the body affected.

10. In particular—(i) do you think that the Legislature should have power, with whatever limitations, to vote supplies (Clause 9 (2))? (ii) do you accept the plan of Grand Committees as the means of giving to the Government the power to secure essential legislation in the event of their failure to carry their propositions in the Council? If so, have you any modifications of detail to suggest? If not, what other method would you suggest to secure the object in view?—(i) Yes. (ii) No. A better method would be the passing of a regulation to last for a year; on its re-submission to the Council at the end of that period, 40 per cent. of the members present and voting should suffice to pass it.

11. Do you accept the position adopted in the Bill (Part II.) that the time has not yet come to give the Legislative Assembly a similar measure of control over the Central Government as that given to Provincial Legislative Councils over Provisional Governments?—I agree to the control being less, but some control should be given.

12. Do you agree that it is advisable none the less to provide for a substantial elective majority in the Indian Legislature (Clause 16)?—Most certainly.

13. Do you accept the plan of a bi-cameral Legislature as arising out of this, as constituting both a satisfactory machine for the ordinary purposes of legislation and as affording the means to the Governor-General in Council to secure legislation which he regards as essential (Clauses 14, 15, and 16)?—No. A Second Chamber is not necessary in India, where conservative tendencies are already too strong, and where the new electorates are too small to include the democratic elements which favour over-hasty legislation. A quickening rather than a retarding impulse is needed. All interests are represented in the Assembly, and it is not necessary to duplicate those of landlords and capitalists in a Second Chamber. The Governor-General can already issue ordinances and regulations, and the Bill does not deprive him of those powers. I would limit his power of issuing Regulations, by making them valid for one year only, to be renewed if 40 per cent. of the members of the Assembly present and voting passed them (Memorandum p. 9, Secs. 14-15, para. 2.) If some further instrument is thought necessary I would prefer Grand Committees to the Council of State.

14. Do you accept the provisions of the Bill as to the course of legislation in the Indian Legislature (Clause 20 (3) and (4))? Or do you regard them as unnecessarily restrictive on the popular will, or as an inadequate means of ensuring to the Governor-General in Council the discharge of his responsibilities?—No. While objecting to the Council of State as a whole, I think a decision reached by a joint sitting, if final, would lessen its objectionableness, but Clause 20 (4) should be limited to a temporary measure concerning order, tranquillity and emergency, and even this is unnecessary, as the Governor-General has the power of issuing regulations and ordinances.

15. Do you accept the changes made by the Bill (Clause 21) in the constitution of the Governor-General's Executive Council? If not, what are your reasons, and what modifications would you suggest?—Half the Executive should be Indians, as universally demanded by Indian opinion, and if diarchy is not introduced these should be selected from among the elected members of the Assembly.

16. Do you think that the development of Provincial autonomy on the one hand, and of self-government in the Provinces on the other, involves any modification of the provisions of Sections 2, 33 and 45 of the Government of India Act (Clause 23)?—As the process of devolution proceeds, it appears to me probable that new lines of demarcation will have to be made between the powers of the Secretary of State for India and those passing to a self-governing India, assimilating his powers to those held by the Secretary of State to the Colonies, and that would imply a change in Section 2. The changes made in Sections 33 and 45 appear to me to be adequate, but I am not sufficiently seised of the subjects with which these sections are concerned to express an opinion of any value.

17. Do you agree that the gradual realisation of responsible government involves periodical examination of progress by independent authority, and that the provisions of Clause 28 of the Bill are well designed to afford such examination?—No. I do not consider it is consistent with the rights and the dignity of India that she should be subjected to periodical examinations as to her progress. Having started India on the road to Home Rule, it should be left to her representative Councils to regulate her advance to complete responsible government.

18. Are there any matters which it is proposed in the Bill to deal with by rule which you would suggest should be provided for in the Bill?—The election of the Presidents and Vice-Presidents of Council and Assembly. Clause 9 (b).

19. Have you any observations to offer on the Reports of Lord Southborough's Committees and of the Committee on the Home Administration of Indian Affairs?—I accept the Report on Functions, subject to remarks in Memorandum p. 4, Clause 1 (i) (a). On the Report on the Franchise I beg to refer to Memorandum pp. 5, 6. Clause 6 (1) (3) (b). On the Report on Home Administration of Indian Affairs, I accept (p. 13, para. 35): (i) As a valuable check on the power of certification; (ii) as a clear step towards responsible government; (iii) as preferable to precise delimitation as suggested by Professor Keith, while I admit the value of his expert opinion; (v) a distinct improvement, preferred by Indian opinion; (vi) Indian opinion has long desired the abolition of the Council of State herein given; (xvi) will be approved highly by Indian opinion; (xix) the same remark applies. I suggest the following changes: (vii) The Council being abolished, it is useless to create a feeble double, to be vivified only on occasion; the Secretary of State can call in any special expert when he wants expert advice; (viii-xiv) these fall with (vii); the proposal of between £72,000 and £144,000 annually for unnecessary advisers condemns itself; (xv) seems unnecessary, being obvious; (xvii) of doubtful utility; (xviii) it would be preferable to assign an Under-Secretaryship of State to an Indian; (xx) I approve the establishment of a Select Committee. The remark (para. 33) that members are already over-burdened is a good argument for Home Rule, but to have a small number of members with a special duty to India is better than to have none.

1337. That is of great assistance to us, and I am much obliged to you. I will ask Lord Sinha to commence asking you questions?—May I ask one question before I begin? I do not know if it would facilitate and shorten the work if, as Mr. Banerjea stated the points which he held on behalf of the Moderate deputation, I should follow that by a preliminary statement, saying how far the deputation I represent agrees with those points. I think it might possibly shorten the discussion.

1338. Please do so?—I prepared it last night. Speaking generally for my deputation, we agree with Mr. Surendranath Banerjea that the Bill must not be whittled down from its present provisions, and we add that the whittling down that it has already undergone as compared with the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, issued after the full discussion to which the draft Report was submitted at the hands of the Supreme and Local Governments, should be remedied. The most important of these will be found on page 3 of my answers, Question 7, and I lay special stress on the necessity of restoring 1, 2, and 4. The first of these points is that laid stress on by Mr. Banerjea, of the five years' revision instead of ten; the second, the vote of the Ministers' salaries being transferred at that period; and the third the point about the Budget, on which I shall probably be asked questions later. Transference on application from a Legislature is the right method of the progressive realisation of responsible Government, and it should be substituted for periodical examination by Statutory Commissions. (Note Clause 1 (a). p. 4, line 7, of Memorandum.) Complete Provincial autonomy would be enjoyed by the third Legislative Council if the periods were reduced to three years instead of five—that is, for the lifetime of a Council.

We also agree with Mr. Banerjea in accepting the principle of diarchy as inevitable in a transitional stage from irresponsible to responsible Government. It was found in a slightly different and more disguised form in the transition from irresponsible to responsible Government in the Colonies, when the Governor's Executive Council, appointed by him under his Letters Patent, was increased by Ministers chosen and dismissable by him, the mixed Council being irremovable by a vote, though confronted with a representative Legislature. I cannot conceive of any other way of transfer by stages, though it is more camouflaged in the Congress-League scheme based on Colonial precedents. The inconveniences inseparable from diarchy gradually force complete responsibility, which comes naturally by the increasing power of Ministers backed by a strong Legislature, and will come in India without serious shock if the drag of periodical examinations be omitted.

We agree with Mr. Banerjea in the necessity of giving control of the Budget, and therefore in the restoration of the Montagu-Chelmsford proposals, paragraphs 256 and 257. We urge that it is absolutely necessary to make the resolutions of the Legislature binding in the decrease of reserved subjects' allotments where they carry out a majority vote in the Executive Government after discussion as a whole, except where the Governor or Governor-General certifies that the proposed vote is necessary for peace, order, or defence of the country, foreign affairs, or carrying out relations with Indian Princes. It is vital that Ministers alone should approve, and possibly propose, all taxation, but after full discussion in the whole Executive Government the Budget should be presented as a whole to the Legislature, whose resolutions, as said, should be binding. (See p. 6, Memo., Clause 9 (2).) I was glad to hear Sir James Meston agree with Mr. Montagu that the procedure suggested might be applied to the Budget of the Central Government. (See Evidence, Q. 440-445.) That would carry us in the direction of fiscal autonomy, which is claimed by Indian opinion almost most insistently than anything else.

We also agree with Mr. Banerjea in urging that Diarchy shall be introduced into the Central Government. Without this the Bill is like a cart on one wheel, and responsibility in the Provinces over-ruled by autocracy in the Centre will prove unworkable, and will render provincial responsibility a shadow. Absence of all responsibility in the Centre will reduce the Indian Assembly to the futile condition of Provincial Legislatures now, and will overshadow the Provinces with the menace of interference. India is not likely to submit to an autocracy for another ten years, much less for an indefinite time, when all the rest of the world is free from that anachronism, and continual agitation will be the result of the preservation of the machinery of autocracy.

We also agree in the appointment of half the Governor-General's Executive Council of Indians, and in dislike of the Council of State, though my colleagues and myself object to it wholly, and prefer to it a Grand Committee, or an Ordinance to last for a year, to be then re-submitted to the Assembly and passed by 40 per cent. of the members present and voting, or rejected.

We endorse the Moderate contention stated in Memo., pp. 5 and 6, Clause 5 (2). "The Governor should have no greater power over Ministers than over Executive Councillors, and whatever power the Governor in Council has to interfere with decisions of Governor and Ministers on the ground of their possible effect on reserved subjects, the same power should be given to Governor and Ministers in regard to decisions of the Governor in Council affecting transferred subjects, making them completely equal." Also, in order to carry out the Secretary of State's statement to the House of Commons on June 5, that "The Provincial Government has got to defer to its Legislature by statute, that is to say, in transferred subjects you have a Government which is responsible to the Legislature," it is necessary that the Joint Committee should adopt the principle of the proposal of the Congresses and Muslim League, that "the relation of the Governor to the Ministers in regard to the transferred subjects shall be the same as that obtaining in the self-governing Dominions," with the difference that the Governor in the present scheme is both representative of the King and of the Prime Minister. If, as Mr. Montagu also said, "So far as transferred subjects are concerned, we shall have parted with our trusteeship and surrendered it to the representatives of the people of India," the rules made under 5 (2) must carry out the above policy. It is also rendered necessary by Mr. Montagu's criticism of the alternative scheme of the Local Governments that "there is no certainty of control by the Legislature (in that scheme) because on all subjects, if the Governor certifies it is in the interests of his Province, he can over-ride it." We are therefore asking that the Joint Committee will specially lay stress on that point.

We agree with equality of salary and status between Councillors and Ministers. We believe that the members of all the progressive deputations in England agree with Mr. Banerjea on these vital points, and most of us differ only on lesser. But my colleagues and I differ with him on the desirability of claiming woman suffrage as part of the present Bill. We urge that the objections to it are weak and artificial, and that it introduces a sex disability into Indian life that is alien to its whole spirit, for in the elected Councils which have marked Indian civilisation from the dawn of history women were not barred, and the idea of sex as a barrier only came with Western systems, and even these did not succeed in barring University degrees to women. Woman suffrage has been carried in the two Congresses before which it has been brought, and in all the district and other conferences where it has been proposed. Why should a fresh cause of agitation be set on foot by the Bill? With regard to that agitation, I would refer the Joint Committee to page 5, in which it is pointed out that women's agitations in India are markedly formidable. They have already agitated with regard to South African troubles, and succeeded. They have agitated also against the Fiji indenture system, and formed a deputation to the Viceroy, which obtained from him a promise that the indenture should be cancelled. And in other cases which they have taken up they have never yet failed in obtaining that which they desired, even where men had failed, partly because Indian men would not tolerate police interference where women are concerned. Therefore, they have been able to carry out an agitation on lines where men have been stopped by the police, and it seems to me very undesirable that an agitation of that kind should be liable to be started by the very powerful section of educated women who are pressing for woman suffrage.

It is true, as stated by Mr. Banerjea, that there might be some objection from orthodoxy or conservatism. I should say from modern orthodoxy and modern conservatism. They object to the revival of the old Hindoo custom of recognising woman's place in public life. Any objectors can easily stay away from the polls. There is no reason why they should be helped to keep away other women whose men wish for their help.

We do not approve of communal representation, as it intensifies separation by importing religious questions into politics, where few, if any, political interests divide the persons. We except from this the Mohamedans in consequence of the Lucknow Compact, as it has been called, and the belief that their desire for it is gradually diminishing under the increasing tendency to unite the two great communities. The objections to the others I will leave. They will probably come up in questions, so that I need not put them here. But one that we particularly object to is the European electorate, because it is already largely over-represented in proportion to its numbers. It is represented in Chambers of Commerce, in Planters' Associations, and in other specifically European represented in the special electorates already given, and so on, and we think, therefore, that being over-represented in the special electorates already given, there ought not to be another special electorate confined to Europeans alone.

We venture respectfully to urge on the Joint Committee that it will carry out Mr. Montagu's promise in his speech on the second reading that the policy embodied in the rules will be fully laid down by the Joint Committee. The letter of the Government of India, March 5, 1919, and the despatches of the Local Governments show how unfriendly they are to the new policy, and rules made by them will, as in the case of the Morley-Minto reforms, emasculate the reforms embodied in the Bill; the warm welcome given to the Morley-Minto proposals in the Congress of 1908, and the bitter disappointment expressed in the Congress of 1909, mark the injury that may be done by rules made by reactionary Governments of reforms conceded by Parliament in a liberal spirit.

We think the Report of the Functions Committee satisfactory on the whole, but would transfer land revenue, irrigation and famine relief, the first two as sources of revenue for the spending Departments transferred, because the greatest spending Departments are to be transferred to Ministers. The only solid source of revenue transferred appears to be Excise, but the expansion of that means outraging the religious feelings of Hindoos and Musalmans and the few Buddhists in India, as well as implying the moral degradation of the people. We regard the Franchise Report as unsatisfactory, the property qualification being too high, and no literacy qualification being added. About 3,000,000 of literates are excluded. The Crewe Committee Report we accept as far as regards provisions 1 to 6, 16, 19 and 20. We suggest the changes stated in 7 to 14 and 18, and we would omit 15 and 17 as unnecessary. The changes stated turn on the substitution of the Advisory Committee for the Secretary of State's Council. We conceive that the Secretary of State will be able to call in any expert evidence or counsel that he wants when the occasion arises, and that the heavy increase of expenditure, 144,000 rupees, or half that amount, is quite unnecessary when the whole expert evidence is available for the Secretary of State whenever he needs it. We are therefore in favour of the entire abolition of the Secretary of State's Council, as has been asked for by the Congress for a very long period of time.

Lord Sinha.

1339. There are one or two points with reference to which I want to ask you one or two questions. Have you answered Question 18, which asks: "Are there any matters which it is proposed in the Bill to deal with by rule which you would suggest should be provided for in the Bill?" Is that question answered in your answers—because I am afraid it was not answered in Mr. Banerjea's?—There is one we think should be statutory, and not left to the rules. It is the chief one on which unity of opinion exists amongst the deputations. I have not gone there, deliberately, into details.

1340. Is that the only one?—It is the only one which unanimity exists on.

1341. Have you considered as to whether, under Clause 3 of the Bill, when there is more than one Minister, the Ministers are a corporate body in the same way as the Executive Council, or they are not? Have you considered that question?—I have not considered it in that form. I have rather considered it with the desire that the Executive Government should form a whole, as far as possible, that is that the Executive Council and the Ministers, with the Governor presiding over both, should decide all possible subjects together, so that the whole effect of the transfer might be made more effective by preparing the Ministers later for further transferred subjects. I have not thought of them so much as a separate entity. I think they would tend to become so, and that would be rather a subject of friction. There would be the tendency towards Governor plus Ministers as one entity, and Governor plus Councillors as the other.

1342. When there are more Ministers than one, is there any provision in the Bill which provides for their acting together in relation to all the Departments which are transferred?—No; I have not observed that in the Bill.

1343. Do you think that desirable?—As they increase in number they would have a majority vote, if all vote together, and therefore I do not think there is so very much necessity for it.

1344. You say if they all voted together. Do you mean the Executive Council, as well as the Ministers?—I am hoping that that will be the result, ultimately. I think it will inevitably come to that by the friction which will otherwise occur with the Legislature.

1345. I want, if possible, to keep your mind away from the Executive Council for the moment. I follow what you have said with regard to the desirability of the Executive Council and Ministers consulting together?—Your Lordship realises that I am trying to get a steady increase of power with the Legislature and Ministers.

1346. I am trying to keep the Ministerial portion of the governing body separate. Do you think it desirable that, when there is more than one Minister, the Ministers—two or three, as the case may be, or more—should form one whole, like the Executive Council does?—I am inclined to say—though I have not considered it carefully, and I should therefore like to make my answer rather limited in that sense—I consider that it would be desirable gradually that they should become a corporate body, because I believe that under those circumstances the Executive Council would disappear, as it has practically disappeared in the Colonies, and, as the Privy Council here does not influence decisions, we should have a Cabinet in the ordinary way, without any sort of friction or difficulty.

Mr. Montagu.

1347. You appreciate the fact that the adoption of House of Commons procedure for the budget does not necessarily involve any lessening of the power of the Legislature? It is a different way of proceeding?—It is rather different; but it seems to me the power then would almost be equivalent to that of the House of Commons, if the full scheme were carried out as adumbrated in the Report.

1348. Just explain to me the difference, if you will. Under the Bill the Legislature may not move to increase expenditure but only to reduce it?—Quite.

1349. That is in conformity with the House of Commons procedure?—Yes.

1350. If it reduces expenditure that a Minister wishes, he can refuse it because it is not large enough, and it therefore comes up as a vote of censure on the Minister?—Yes.

1351. Therefore the effect is the same as if he moved to increase it?—So far, but the Governor has the power to restore in the Bill.

1352. Not in a transferred subject?—Not in a transferred subject, no, but in a reserved. It is partly inevitable from the transitional state.

1353. There is only one other question. The provision for alteration in five years of the transferred subjects by the Government of India on appeal was only part of a proposal which has been abandoned. You will remember that in the scheme as originally published the Ministers' salaries were not voted by the Council at the outset, and it was suggested that at the end of five years the Government of India might cause their salaries to be voted, and, at the same time, increase the number of transferred subjects?—Yes.

1354. You have asked that the power of the Government of India to increase the number of transferred subjects shall be retained. Would you like the whole proposal kept?—Does the whole proposal include the statutory commissions or not? I want them to go from the Report.

1355. I am sorry I have not made my point clear, and it is rather important to me. The original proposal was that Ministers' salaries should be a reserved subject for the first six years?—Yes.

1357. On application to the Government of India. You ask that the second of those two points should be kept in the Bill. Now, supposing you were told—I am only putting this as a hypothesis?——?—I am asking for both.

1358. You want the salaries to be reserved for five years?—I do not want it, but I am content to accept it. I have suggested that it should be three years, but in the answer on that, which is Answer 7, I think, you will see that I propose that both of these points suggested by yourself should be embodied in the Bill. We suggest the transference of additional subjects at the end of five years on the application of a Province (paragraph 260), and that the voting of Ministers' salaries should be transferred to the Council.

1359. At the end of five years?—Yes. I have suggested three years, that is the lifetime of a Legislative Council, so as to gain complete autonomy at the end of the second. One reason for my suggestion is that as was pointed out in your own speech, a very liberal Governor, such, for instance, as we have now in Bombay and Madras, might treat reserved subjects as though they were transferred, and so practically bring provincial autonomy much nearer, and that difference between Provinces seemed to me to add greatly to elasticity, so that those who felt capable might ask for more and those who felt less capable might ask for less. That was really what was underlying my suggestion that it should be left to the Provinces to apply.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

1360. You have taken a good deal of part in organising the movement for Home Rule?—A great deal.

1362. Do not you think there is a danger, once Parliament has settled the whole of this question, that if there is to be so early a reconsideration as five years, a great deal of time will be wasted and power will be wasted in agitating for fresh concessions at the end of five years rather than in working on the very large powers proposed to be given?—I do not think so, because if the modifications we propose are granted they will give a very widespread sense of satisfaction. I am afraid if the matter is left for ten years, and this Bill as it stands is final for that time, the agitation is likely to be extremely strong and very united. I think all parties will practically unite in leading a strong agitation, especially for some power in the Central Government. That and fiscal autonomy are the two things which will, I think, lead to very strong agitation unless they are put into the Bill. If they are, then I think the agitation will diminish very much in strength, and, in fact, the more the Joint Committee finds itself able to give the less will the agitation be in India, and the more work will go into utilising the powers given. That is frankly what I myself feel, and, of course, I have taken a very strong part in agitating for much more than these. We still hold to our desire for Home Rule to be reached as rapidly as is possible by stages; we could not give that up, and we should always hold that up as the ideal.

1363. Can you give us any precedent in any other Constitution for reconsidering the whole position in five or even ten years?—No definite Constitution has been granted at all comparable to the nature of the Bill which is now before Parliament. I suggested in the summary which I read that if these limitations were removed and the Statutory Commission disappeared, then there would be a steady approach to responsible Government as in the Colonies until it was gained, because there also it was not given in the form of the first State Legislatures. It came by the steady demand for more and more responsibility of Ministers to the Legislature. I believe that that, under present conditions in India, would be equally efficacious, and that you would not be called upon for any Constitution until some Federal question arises (and I am not dealing, of course, with that now), as in Australia, where there were separate States, and a Commonwealth Act was passed later on; but if it is to be marked out in unsatisfactory stages and revisions by an outside authority, I am afraid that will be felt as a very great interference with the power of Indians to formulate for themselves a system more suitable than an exact replica of the Western system is likely to be. If you allowed responsibility to come gradually, then I think we might gain that, and looking at the Colonial experience, the comparatively small powers given at first to the Colonial Legislature with the representative Assembly when that was first granted, looking at the way in which the Government was left a great deal of discretion, but was gradually limited by the strength and composition of the new Legislature, I think that Indians now are sufficiently strongly backboned and definite in their political aspirations to be able to trust to that pressure, and therefore I am willing to accept more discretion than I otherwise should be, taking the Colonies as examples and thinking that the Indian population has risen to that political consciousness which was only found before among the descendants of British people.

1364. You said something and you put something in your paper regarding the Committee on home administration which is sometimes, for the sake of brevity, called after my name?—Yes.

1365. I am glad to see that you approve of a good many of our recommendations?—Most of them.

1366. Such as those, for instance, which provide that where there is an agreement between the Legislature and the Government, as a rule there should not be interference from this country. You also approve of the division of the functions of the India Office, that is to say, those which can be regarded as official on the one hand and those which represent agency on the other. You also, I see, approve the abolition of the Secretary of State's Council, but you and your friends do not approve of the creation of an advisory Council to take its place?—That is so.

1367. I suppose you know the general grounds on which it has been held that it is desirable that the Secretary of State should have some backing of experienced expert opinion?—I know those, but I do not think them satisfactory.

1368. You think the Secretary of State might quite properly be placed in the same position as the Secretary of State for the Colonies?—Yes.

1369. In spite of the fact that the Government of India is a more formidable entity, so to speak, than any one of the Colonial Governments with which the Secretary of State for the Colonies has to deal?—That is so; but, on the other hand, I think both from the experience of Lord Morley and, if I may say so, of Mr. Montagu, the authority in the Secretary of State is undoubted, and as he is responsible directly to Parliament it seems to me that that is more satisfactory than an advisory Council.

1370. You think that coming, as he generally does, to the India Office without very intimate knowledge of the country, he would be able to obtain all the necessary backing from the permanent officials of the Departments in the same way that the Secretary of State for the Colonies does?—My hope is always that more and more the Secretary of State will be appointed because he has a knowledge of Indian conditions, and not to suit the party system in Great Britain, just as we all rejoiced when Mr. Montagu came over to India to see something of it, because it was clear from one of the conversations I had with Lord Morley that, as he frankly said, he did not understand the subject, and therefore he sought information from everybody who came over. That kind of casual picking up of information seems to me to be rather unsatisfactory, and if he cannot decide between them the guidance is apt to be rather illusory. I should far prefer in the case of an unfortunate Secretary of State who did not know the Department he was to administer, to ask him to refer to experts on each side where he might get sound help.

1371. You do not think that, supposing the Secretary of State came with a considerable knowledge, he might be regarded as a mere bureaucrat on arrival?—No, because he is responsible to Parliament. That is the great difference between the bureaucrat and the constitutional ruler.

1372. I see you differ from us in approving the establishment of a Select Committee in the House of Commons?—Yes.

1373. You agree that Members of Parliament are already overburdened, but you do not mention, I see, the argument which, I think, mainly weighed with most of us in objecting to the appointment of a Committee, namely, that it might imply a tendency for excessive interference by the House of Commons in Indian affairs?—We do not shrink from the interference of the House of Commons in Indian affairs. We think it is rather desirable, because, on the whole, it would be more liberal than the Governments at present which we have in India. I have noticed, as your Lordship may have seen in one of my answers, that members are already over-burdened. It is a very good argument for home rule. That I fully admit, but a small number of members with a special duty to India is better than none. That is my feeling in the matter.

1374. What occurred to some of us is that the conception of such a Committee involves something of a contradiction—that as you advanced in the direction of a Dominion Government you would naturally get further and further away from the House of Commons. There is no question of having a Committee in the House of Commons to consider Australian, or even South African affairs?—That is so.

1375. The argument which appealed to us was that 30 or 40 years ago such a Committee might have done admirable work, but now, as you advance towards responsible government, you ought to get, in our opinion, further and further away from the direct interference of the House of Commons?—We should be content to get further and further away from it as we advance, so that when we are in the position of Australia or South Africa we should not need then a Select Committee. But until we are in that position we do not think that it would be a great help, and, in fact, we felt a great loss in India since the Indian party in the House, which was formed by Mr. Charles Bradlaugh, has practically disappeared. There is no one to whom we can turn for help in the House of Commons, and we thought that this body would give us what we were trying very inefficiently to form for ourselves. And so we were glad to see it.

1376. It happens there are comparatively few members of the House of Commons now—there is one on my right now, who is an exception; but there are comparatively few who have a first-hand knowledge of India?—That is, unfortunately, true.

1377. Speaking about Dominion Government, you explained, in reply to Mr. Montagu, what your ideas of an advance in that direction are. I gather from what Mr. Banerjea said that his hope is that in five years from now practically all the reserved subjects might become transferred subjects?—I think that is a very general hope—complete Provincial autonomy practically.

1378. That would mean complete Provincial autonomy; but supposing that were brought about, what parallel change regarding the Government of India would have to accompany that in order to make it effective?—That is a question I could not answer fully without thinking very carefully over it. We are quite prepared to admit that responsibility in the Government of India must advance more slowly than in the Provinces. There is no doubt that the feeling in India for complete Provincial autonomy is overwhelmingly strong, and we shall have, some of us, a difficulty in persuading the majority to accept the Bill where it is limited. I am putting it frankly, because that is the point upon which there is a difference of opinion, and in which both the Moderates and the party that I myself represent are a little athwart of the general demand for a rush for general provincial autonomy. The Congress and the Moslem League represent the bulk of Indian opinion; I admit that they do; only I think it is a mistake to press it at the moment. We can get a great deal, and probably if we got that we should not get power in the Central Government. That is what I am afraid of, speaking quite frankly.

1379. it is the case that, taken literally, the complete transfer of reserved subjects to the transferred list in the Provinces would mean something very near Dominion Home Rule?—Very near. It would be Home Rule controlled by the Central Government with, I hope, much diminished powers. We are content to leave, at present, the Army and Navy and Foreign Relations and Relations with Indian Princes in the hands of the Central Government, probably until we have complete Home Rule. In my own mind, that means till we have home defence. I have always ventured to put it that we must have a territorial Army and an efficient Navy for defending the Indian Dominions before we have the right to ask for complete Home Rule. But I think all other subjects but those I have mentioned might be transferred within a period of—I am afraid you will think it rather brief—some 10 or 12 years, and the whole of it probably in from 15 to 20; but the Budget control, which would give us power to control tariff, customs and excise—that we believe to be vital. We agree to have excise out of it now, because that is given to the Provinces.

1380. And those you would ask for immediately?—Yes. We should claim customs and tariffs.

1381. I suppose that law and order in the ordinary sense, apart from national defence, you would regard as a Provincial subject?—At the end of six years, but not in the Government of India. That we would leave with other large subjects until home defence was complete.

1382. As you have studied these subjects so closely, when Home Rule comes, or something very closely approaching Home Rule, what is your conception of the future of the English or British race in India? When they cease to carry on the government of the country country do you contemplate the maintenace, or, perhaps, in some ways the fresh creation of a British Colony, who would assist in carrying on the government and conducting industrial affairs, or do you think the tendency would be for the British connection to die away altogether?—No, I do not think the tendency would be in that direction. I believe that by giving the Indians more and more power in their own country the tendency to keep in connection with Great Britain, to be a member of the British Commonwealth, would be enormously increased; in fact, it is very largely for that reason that I have pressed so strongly in India the rights, as we hold them to be, of Indians to govern their own country. I believe that as regards the position of the English there they would naturally fall into pleasant relations with the Indians when their predominance is removed. I believe that they would be quite likely to be elected to the Indian Assembly and to the Provincial Councils, but I conceive that to get rid of racial feeling and racial antagonism the right of Indians to govern their own country must be conceded as a principle, and the realisation of it as rapidly as is possible by friendly co-operation should also be admitted. I believe that that would mean as close a tie between India and Great Britain as the Colonies have, and the war has proved how close that tie is. My ideal is a great commonwealth in which India is a free nation among other free nations, and I venture to think that the inclusion of India in the League of Nations as an original member is a step in that direction, a recognition that you cannot keep her as a subject nation when she is a member of the League of Nations. It has added to the strength of our contentions.

1383. Do you think that there would be any tendency to some reversion to what obtained to a considerable extent 100 years ago or so, that of the practical establishment in India of some British families living there from generation to generation?—I should think very likely indeed, and very good for both. I believe that both countries are necessary to each other. India is as necessary to Great Britain as Great Britain is to India.

Sir J. D. Rees.

1384. You have lived in Madras, and are familiar with it?—Yes, since 1907.

1385. You know the Madras Presidency very well?—Yes. I have been in India 26 years altogether.

1386. Did you, during your residence in the Madras Presidency, become cognisant of an antagonism, a sort of caste war between the upper and the lower classes?—No, not until the last couple of years.

1387. Do you think it had its origin in politics, and dates from that time, or does it really exist as represented?—No, I do not think it really has a political root. It seems to be an artificial agitation which was very largely fomented by the European element in Madras and favoured negatively—I will not say more than that, because I cannot be quite sure—by the Government of Madras. I ought to state my reason for saying that. Dr. Nair has carried on a very active propaganda—not non-Brahmin, but anti-Brahmin—and has attacked in his papers the class of His Majesty's subjects called Brahmins and exposed them to hatred and contempt with a violence and a virulence of hatred which compared with the Home Rule agitation against the bureaucracy is as whisky is to water. I mean the violence of it has brought it every week within the Press Act, and while I do not complain that the Press Act was not used—because I detest it as an improper instrument of government—the Government showed the greatest partiality in putting all Home Rule papers under security and to leave Justice free, especially as it actually stirred up physical riots against the Brahmanas in Madras and Trichinopoli, and in some other Southern places, and they were actually assaulted and ill-used in consequence of this propaganda. That is why I say there was negative support.

1388. Are you acquainted with the Malabar Coast of Madras?—Fairly well.

1389. Do you think that this dispute was fanned by the long antagonism—if it exists—between the Nairs and the Brahmins upon that coast?—Distinctly so.

1390. Was Sir Sankaran Nair the author of the Malabar Marriage Act?—Yes.

1391. Was the object of that to curtail the extra or marital privileges of the Brahmins?—It was—very properly.

1392. Were those privileges exercised at the expense of the Nair caste?—It very largely descended from alliances between Nair ladies and Brahmanas.

1393. There is no love lost, is there?—There is hatred, and a very natural feeling of resentment.

1394. It is not a subject to pursue the details of. Unless you wish to say anything more about it, we will leave it?—I would rather not. I would only say, in connection with the anti-Brahmana agitation, that it ought to be remembered that the Nair caste in Malabar is far more oppressive than the very much smaller and less influential Brahmana caste, and that the grievance of the lower caste Brahmanas is more against Nairs than against the non-Brahmanas, which makes it very unfair.

1395. The Nairs are the aristocracy of the Malabar Coast?—Yes.

1396. How do you account for their being classed as depressed classes—is that an effort to play upon ignorance?—When living in the United Provinces—as I did for many years—a Nair boy came to the college and was refused admission to the Pathshala, governed by the Pundits, on the ground that he was illegitimate. That drew my attention to it, and I thought that the Nairs were very badly used, and—being ignorant of the south-country feeling, and the position which they held—I, unfortunately, justified Sir Sankaran Nair's opposition to a Hindoo University, on the ground that it grew out of the feeling that they were unfairly used and belonged to a depressed class. That raised a storm of anger among them; but I understand that now it is put forward as a kind of argument. They certainly are not depressed. They are a ruling caste in Malabar.

1397. Would you wish to make any communication regarding the attitude of the upper and lower classes in Madras towards democratic reform, as distinguished from the attitude of the Madras Government, which we will leave out of account. It does not come into my question?—The difference between the attitude of the non-Brahmana high castes and the Brahmana castes towards the lower element or of the whole of the Brahmans only?

1398. Can you speak to the attitude of either the upper or lower castes, or the people of Madras generally, towards these democratic reforms?—I should say that the attitude of the non-Brahmana higher castes, very largely Nair, but also others, wealthy merchants, and so on—— 1399. I leave the West Coast, and ask you generally?—Yes; I put it generally, because it is true all through that they are more rigid as regards the untouchable classes, the submerged classes, than are the Brahmanas. In different parts of the Presidency the uplift movements and the reform movements bringing the submerged people into a better condition of life, and giving them education—those have been led by the Brahmanas, and they have been rather opposed by some of the high caste non-Brahmanas.

1400. You use the word Brahmana as equivalent to Brahmin?—Yes, I will say Brahmins. It is largely because of that that we are entirely objecting to communal representation, as I said we did. It is not the only reason, but it is one reason, because we do not think the submerged classes would gain under communal representation of the Nair type. I am obliged to make the distinction, because the non-Brahmins are not agreed as to who are included in non-Brahmins. There are two great parties, one only includes the Hindoo castes, the three lower castes; the other includes all who literally are not Brahmins, that is, they include Christians and Parsees, and those who belong to no caste, and that is the Presidency Association. They are in favour of including the whole of those as non-Brahmins. Dr. Nair, I understand, limited his non-Brahmins to caste Hindoos, excluding Brahmins only, and that, of course, makes a very great difference because if you take in the whole of the castes or sub-castes you have no possibility of any scheme which could bring about communal representation tion, and that is why no such scheme has ever been brought forward by them. They cannot do it, because there is no such thing as a non-Brahmin community. It does not exist. No scheme has ever been put forward, because it cannot be done.

Mr. Spoor.

1401. During the many years you have spent in India I take it you have had an opportunity of coming into close touch with practically all sections of Indian opinion?—Very close, because I have lived as an Indian there, not as a European.

1402. That being so, I should like to ask whether you agree with the statement which has already been given in evidence here, in Sir James Meston's opinion, at all events, regarding the enormous change of feeling in the country, especially during recent years?—I thoroughly endorse it. I have been there 26 years, and the country is not recognisable, as Sir James Meston said. He put it at 30 years.

1403. I understand development has been even more accelerated during the last five years?—Much more, largely by the war.

1404. You have stated this morning that you fear that if the Bill is finally carried through as at present suggested, and the Central Government retains autocratic power, there will be serious cause of friction. You also said that the exclusion of women might cause friction. Now the wish has been expressed that one effect of these reforms would be to turn the attention of Indians away from agitation into the work done in the Council. Do you think that the Bill will really do that to any great extent having regard to these two important matters?—If those are introduced, I think the agitation will very largely change its character. I do not think it will cease until we have Home Rule any more than here, where Reform Bills did not stop agitation, but it would no longer be bitter. There would no longer be hatred in it due to race superiority, as there is now, I am sorry to say. I think gradually it would take the form of a kind of steady, quiet agitation, chiefly in the Press and on the platform, rather than by public meetings, if we could reach the reforms which are being suggested by us unanimously. I do not think it will disappear. It would not be true to say that, but I think it will be of a kind that no one could possibly object to—educative chiefly.

1405. Do you think that the franchise in the rural and urban areas suggested in the Southborough Report will really include any number of artisans and peasants?—No. I am not able to say that I do, for a very simple reason. I take the urban qualifications separately from the rural because they are so different. In the Franchise Report, on page 21—I am taking Madras because I know the details there so much better; but the same to some extent applies to others—we have there, on pages 20 and 21, the qualifications given of electors. The only one that can possibly apply to any of the mill-workers in Madras would be the first, marked (1a). Clearly there would not be a professional or property tax. There could not be an income tax. They are not retired pensioned officers and so on. The whole of the rest are shut out. So we come down to (1a) as a possible qualification for the highest class of weaver. The weavers are paid more highly than any others—their highest wage is 15 rupees a month, that is £1 a month; and clearly no man living on that income can own or occupy a house of the rental of not less than 120 rupees, and that is 10 rupees a month, so that they are entirely shut out of that.

1406. Would you be in favour of an arrangement under the franchise clauses of the Bill by which the earning capacity of a man, something approaching an average which is earned by the industrial worker, should be made the basis for the franchise? I mentioned yesterday the figure of 150 rupees a year?—That would be even less than the highest wage—15 rupees. I think it would be enough to begin with to take that highest wage and let the others come in gradually, because of the difficulty of registering the number of voters.

1407. You would be in favour of adopting the earning capacity as a basis?—Yes, in towns; but in the country, of course, where we have 20 rupees given as the land tax, that is so high that it would practically exclude the peasant proprietor. There are peasant proprietors in Madras to the extent of 4,222,000 by the last census.

1408. For all practical purposes, if this Bill goes through, if the suggestions of the Southborough Report are adopted, that means that the industrial classes are going without representation?—Practically. A few would be brought in if the literacy qualification were added.

1409. How many would be brought in then?—There I cannot say, because there is no way in which people are distinguished as literates and illiterates, and also according to their earnings or holdings or taxation. The peasant proprietor's holding is taken from the land revenue administration, but we do not get help in the census, and we are in the difficulty that with regard to women there is no distinction made between tax-payers, whether men or women, which limits us, in the estimate of the addition which may come in, to the municipal franchise as regards women, which is very imperfect. I do not know if I should mention this, because it shows the great difficulty of the question. Taking the population of these people who pay less than 10 rupees, while here 20 is the limit, even if you halve that you would then bring in out of this total population of 4 millions a population of 2¼ millions, which is an enormous increase. It is only fair to put that when the question is being put with regard to qualification. It is so great, and the people are so miserably poor, that it is difficult to lower the qualification without getting an enormous increase. The proposal of halving the qualification meant practically adding something like 2½ millions to the register of Madras alone, so that the magnitude of this question has to be considered, and it cannot quite be compared with England.

1410. There was a point raised by Sir John Rees this morning. Are there any labour organisations which in any degree at all correspond with those which exist in the West?—Yes, but only to a very small extent. There is a very large number of old guild organisations, more like those of the Middle Ages, those which spread over the whole of India, and confined to special trades, and those are the available organisations. The Goldsmiths' organisation or guild claimed to be represented in the deputations before Mr. Montagu, and there are such organisations which might be utilised; but during the last sixteen or seventeen months only, there has been a distinct Trade Union movement in Madras which has been brought into being by the exertions of one of my colleagues on the deputation who represents them really, Mr. Wadia. Five definite trade unions have been formed. They manage their own affairs. He is president of the earlier organisation, but they very quickly took it entirely into their own hands and managed it effectively. Those five are modelled on trade organisations, the ordinary unions which you have here, in a sense rather the kind of organisation which you have had to make among unskilled workers first, giving a little outside help until they get over the first difficulties; but that is gradually being eliminated. Though they are skilled men really they are in the position that your unskilled labourers are as far as political affairs go.

1411. Do you think it probable that the trade union movement will be built up there, because you will agree, I imagine, that the economic problems and conditions in India are fundamentally the same as they are in other countries, and therefore you think there is some chance, making allowances for different national characteristics, and so on, of a movement corresponding with the European labour movement?—I am sure it will spread very rapidly. There is a great difficulty now because of the opposition to it, not only from mine-owners, but from the Governments as well. They object to any organisation of this kind being made, and it is specially objected to in Madras, even such a thing as opening banks for them or rice stores for them when prices went up so much. The whole of that was objected to. Mr. Wadia was called up about it, and it was pointed out that this was not desirable, because it made the labourers independent. In planters' organisations the same objection has been raised—raised—it means independence and self-respect. In Bombay, where there have been strikes, there is at present no trade union organisation, but they act together, which means that they will very soon have one.

Chairman.] We take note of those statements as Mrs. Besant's opinions. Of course, they are not proved in any sense as representing the views of the Government.

1412. I quite agree. (To the Witness.) with regard to the question of suffrage for women, have you any special reason for desiring its inclusion at the present juncture? There is a conflict of opinion as to whether it would be wise to introduce it just now, or whether it would not be better to defer it?—I do not think there is much conflict of opinion. It was said in the Franchise Report that very little evidence was offered against and that some was offered in favour of it. I do not think there would be a real conflict among people who take part in political life. The objection to it would be more among classes which hold aloof from political life altogether, and I do not think there would be any difficulty in recording the votes, any more than there is in recording the Municipal Franchise votes.

1413. I was going to ask whether there would be any difficulty in devising some machinery for electoral purposes for women. It has been suggested that there are almost insuperable difficulties there?—There is no special machinery needed, so far as we can judge from the Municipal Franchise. The purdah is very limited in India, though it exists largely in Bengal. But even in Bengal you have large numbers of educated women in the reformed sects which do not observe it, and will take part in such franchise. There are no separate polling booths in Bombay for women voters, and no separate arrangement, as was established in Australia, curiously enough, when women franchise was given. They collected the votes there at the women's houses. We do not ask for that. We think they could quite well go to the poll in the ordinary way as they now go to the Municipal Franchise, and if we can judge from the franchise returns, it would mean at first only about one million women. That is only a very rough guess, because it is founded on imperfect knowledge. We think the numbers would be limited chiefly to the educated classes at present, but that would very quickly pass, and more and more would come in, but they would come in gradually. We do not think the number of absentions is important, seeing how many abstain even over here.

1414. The Chairman asked Lord Southborough this, and I will repeat the question, because it appears to me to go to the very root of the whole of the problem we are dealing with: "Has not the evolution of human society, in all its aspects through many centuries, been totally dissimilar in India and in England?" I would like your opinion on that?—Yes, very different, and India very much misunderstood, because phrases which are used over here growing out of past conditions in Europe, are applied to India as though they really applied to it in the same sense. I may venture on that perhaps to say exactly what I mean, by referring to the statement of Sir James Meston, that it was a great experiment for the first time in forming a democracy in India. Now that statement could only be made by one who knew the West well, and was not acquainted with the Indian past where there was Council Government of villages with democratic ways of voting—what you would call the ballot, only making use of slips of coloured wood, by Assemblies—what here would be called a referendum in a State; the complete management of village affairs, which extended from the 6th century B.C. down to 1816, even through the earlier changes of the East India Company, and the habit which still exists in India of the Council, no longer in the village, unfortunately, but in the caste where the same system has persisted. In addition to that there were many forms of Republican Government in India which are on record in all histories—of limited monarchies and monarchs, always ruling by means of Councils, of Free Cities like the Free City of Aristotle, of Municipalities, which admittedly came to Europe from the East—that is admitted practically by Sir Henry Maine—as well as the system of the Saxons. India is permeated with democracies within small areas, and as there would be districts and divisions of districts you come to larger areas here than in some of the old States. So that it is an entire mistake to imagine that it is an experiment of a new kind. But I think that if Indians had their way they would have introduced the Local Government system as part of this Bill, and have built up from the village straight up to the supreme Government. That, of course, would imply differences. That is why I object to periodical examination. It stereotypes the Western way of ruling, whereas if you would give power to the present Provincial Councils as you have them modified here, and leave them open to take over power after power as they feel readier to take responsibility, then I think you would have a system more suitable to Indian genius than the complete imposition of some constitution like that of Australia or South Africa, or, indeed, of Canada.

1415. It really is as unnecessary as it would be unwise to try and impose Western governmental methods permanently on India?—Yes. I believe in Indian self-determination, and I think the opening of it is here in that direction, and that if the Indians are strong, as I believe they are, they will be able to win it through this system.

Major Ormsby-Gore.

1416. You said two main points of Indian political opinion were first the concentration of fiscal autonomy, and, secondly, some further advance in home government. Take fiscal autonomy first. That means Customs autonomy?—It means Customs and Excise Duties, which now in India is a very peculiar arrangement. It means the power to control the tariff completely, and that we think ought to be in the hands of the Legislature, not of the Centre.

1417. Indian opinion is in favour of fiscal autonomy, by which you mean Tariff autonomy?—I prefer the word "fiscal."

1418. Fiscal autonomy including tariff autonomy—that demand is shared by the non-political classes equally with all sections of Indian political thought?—I have to ask you just what you mean by non-political classes, because, as Sir James Meston pointed out, the merchants who used to be non-political are now very strongly political.

1419. I was thinking of them particularly?—The very orthodox classes I should say were non-political, but if you take the merchants the whole of the Home Rule movement in India grew out of the merchants' support of it and their financing of it. It has spread now to the masses and the rural people and the working population both in the cities and in the districts.

1420. Opinion is taking a protectionist turn, with a view to building up Indian industries in India?—Yes.

1421. They feel we have adopted Free Trade in India against the will of the Indian people?—They feel more than that. They feel that England was in favour of protection so long as it favoured the industries which existed here which were also being carried on largely in India; for instance, the whole of the cotton industry. Indian cottons, calicoes and so on supplied the whole English need until power machinery was introduced into Lancashire, and then protective duties were put on in England. It was made a little later penal to import any Indian calicoes into England at all, until Lancashire had captured the whole of the cotton trade. When it had captured it, and when it was producing more than the English market could eat up, then England declared in favour of Free Trade. Now all our industries have been destroyed by the East India Company. We had an enormous manufacturing industry, which even as late as 1813, in a Commission of the House of Commons, was stated by Sir James Munro, in giving evidence before that Commission, to be of marvellous skill, providing all articles that were needed—I think he said for comfort and luxury, but anyhow, providing all—and the export trade of India of manufactured articles was enormous. That was destroyed by the East India Company's pressure, which encouraged raw materials for export, but discouraged manufactured articles for export, until India has been reduced reduced more or less to the condition to which Ireland was reduced by similar means exactly on the part of the Government powers here, with regard to her woollen manufactures. The whole population was thrown on the land, and that means miserable poverty. Hence we want to restore manufactures. They are beginning, but they have been handicapped in regard to power machinery by the Excise Duty which protected Lancashire against the Indian manufacturers, which is Protection upside down. We would rather turn it the other way up, and have it in its normal form if it is to be had at all. That is one reason why we need it. We believe the weaving industry, even with hand-looms, helped by a certain amount of power, can be regained in the villages. Weavers go from these weaving industries into agriculture because of the price at the present time of the goods which they make, as they are undersold by the machine-produced articles. The finer kinds are still only to be made in India by hand; machinery cannot deal with them. An objection also is that England is forcing on India different kinds of raw production suitable to Lancashire but unsuitable to Indian textile manufactures. She is insisting on the production of long staple cotton instead of the short staple, which suits the Indian mills, because that is what Lancashire wants. So that we are working really against Lancashire, plus Government power. In addition to that there are very large concessions made to English firms which ought to pass into Indian hands as they have been built up by the Government on Indian money—by taxation. There are a number of reasons like this; I cannot give the whole of them. We want to get control over finances. We say that if India is to provide taxation, India, by her representatives, ought to levy the taxes. That we have learned from a well-known phrase among English politicians.

1422. If the Committee saw fit to support the demand for fiscal autonomy, including tariff, do you think India would be likely to come into the Imperial system of reciprocal Preference?—I should not like to give an opinion about that. I should say that in fiscal autonomy we include the land revenue, which is provincial.

1423. Your other main point was this: You spoke of some advance in Central Government?—Yes.

1424. And increasing the fiscal power of the Legislative Assembly. Do you want a definite system of division of functions in the Central Government of India similar to the proposed division of functions in the Provinces?—I should like it, but I do not know how far at present there is the smallest chance of getting it, and I should be content if we had fiscal autonomy.

1425. That is the main thing you want?—That is the main thing we want, because we feel that we could get the other things largely for ourselves.

1426. With regard to Women's Suffrage, has Women's Suffrage existed for municipal franchise outside Bombay?—It exists in some other towns as well. Do you mean outside Bombay City or outside Bombay Presidency?

1427. Bombay Presidency?—It is in all the municipalities there. It did exist at one time in Madras. I am not able to find any reason for its being withdrawn, except by what was called a reactionary municipality. No complaint was made that it was ill-used or misused in any way. There seems to have been a sort of wave of prejudice.

1428. It was not used much?—No. But now it is not allowed even for the professional or trading tax. I pay very heavy rates, but I have no vote.

1429. Would you be willing to leave the decision of a question like Women's Suffrage to the various Legislative Councils in the Provinces? That is to say, would you agree to an amendment of the Bill in your direction which said that Legislative Councils should have power to grant women votes if they saw fit before the ten years period?—Yes; I should, if the principle were established in the Act by removing the sex disqualification, as being better than total exclusion, and because I believe that the more power is given to Legislative Councils the nearer we are to full responsibility, and I think that the vote of a Legislative Council on a matter of that sort, in fact on most matters, ought to be listened to as much as possible, even though it may

1430. Is that your own view on the question of the woman's franchise?—I was asked to represent a number of women's associations, and I do not know how far they would agree with the answer. I must give it as a personal answer, not as one for those who asked me to represent them, because it has never been raised, so far as I know.

1431. Would you give me your views on the question of the bi-cameral system both in the Provinces and in the Central Government of India? Do you think it is desirable to have two chambers?—No, I do not. I am not in favour of a bi-cameral system anywhere, but that is so much against general experience and views that I should not press that view strongly. I believe that one chamber is sufficient, but I admit that in countries where you have a very large franchise there may sometimes be a value in a revising chamber. That, I think, may be admitted. But in India we do not want revision, we want impulse. I mean the conservative element is so powerful in India, the disinclination to move, that we want a spur rather than a brake. And a revising chamber must always be and is meant to be a brake. I cannot imagine that for many years to come we shall need any revising in the sense of over-hasty popular legislation.

1432. Would not you say that there are individuals, if not classes of Indians, who might be somewhat reluctant to face the ordeal of general elections, but who, by their age or past services or experience would be most useful in a constitutional Assembly?—Yes; I think that is true to a very considerable extent, and I do not think that my own view, which comes from 1874, against a second chamber is necessarily at all shared even by those whom I more personally represent. I fancy, but I am speaking not with real knowledge, that the bulk of opinion in India would rather favour a bi-cameral arrangement like that of the Colonies, and, in fact, like the whole British Commonwealth, and I do think that for some time to come the danger or the difficulty that you speak of is very likely to arise, and that the value of the advice of such men, if they were elected, not nominated—that I must make a sine quâ non—would be recognised. Even if they were elected by a more restricted suffrage, say, of the Legislative Chambers, when they are enlarged and more popular, I think that such a thing would certainly not raise much opposition in India, and might carry with it popular opinion.

1433. One question on your evidence this morning. You said you were anxious to see transferred at once in the Provinces the three subjects of land revenue, irrigation and famine relief which are now reserved. Will you give me your argument in support of the proposal to transfer those three subjects?—It is one of the greatest grievances at present in India that the Legislative Council have no power at all with regard to the periodical re-assessments of the land. The land tax is one which, of course, represents the old land tax, but is very much larger.

1434. Not larger than in the Mogol times?—Much larger than then, because in many Provinces it goes to 50 per cent., whereas Akbar took one-fourth or one-sixth. Other Mogols only took one-fourth or one-twelfth and most Hindoo sovereigns varied from one-fourth to one-sixth or one-tenth. It is enormously larger. In the Legislative Councils they have no power, of course, to deal with the question whether there shall or shall not be an assessment, nor what the nature of the assessment should be. They are absolutely helpless, and very much resentment has been felt in the present Councils because the representatives of the people had no power to do anything with regard to the tax to be levied upon them. How strong that is may be shown, perhaps, by one illustration, though I could give many, in the Bombay Presidency, where the amount of enhanced land tax in one of these periodical assessments balanced, within a small sum, the amount of borrowing by the peasantry in that particular year, showing that the enhanced land tax meant the absolute borrowing by the peasants of the money which was necessary for the paying of that tax. That is, of course, an extreme case that I mentioned, but it occurred; it was given by Mr. Joshi. Mr. Joshi pointed out that the land tax trenches on the subsistence of the peasant. It is clear that the subsistence of the peasant is the primary care of every legislature, and that therefore a tax which is proved under Government management to have these terrible effects on the prosperity of the local population ought to pass into the hands of those who represent that population. That is one of the very strongest feelings at present in India on the land tax.

1435. Irrigation and famine relief—are there any special points on that?—The special point about irrigation is that irrigation is very much starved by the Government in comparison with railways. It pays crores to railways where the interest goes normally to the companies every year, and it starves irrigation where the returns are immensely larger. I mean, you find them something like five to one or four to one, and that goes to the benefit of the population, so we want irrigation put in their hands.

1436. Have you any special point on famine relief?—Simply that we think that in considerable numbers the Indians, especially amongst the professional classes, which are very hardly hit by the higher prices which largely bring about famines, the whole of the women of those classes very much shrink from examination of any kind by the foreigners. We have found it necessary to supplement Government relief by local committees of Indians, both men and women, very largely composed of Indian women who will come into the houses where widows or women heads of families exist, in order to find out what their real condition is, because there have been pitiful cases of starvation of such women—I mean absolute death by starvation—rather than facing the ordeal of any examination to which they were subjected. We think it would be better to transfer them altogether.

1437. The administration?—Yes. I am not challenging the magnificent work which has been done by English officers when famine is there. Nothing can exceed the devotion they have shown; but they cannot do it, because they are foreigners, to the extent that is needed.

1438. I will close with a question as to what exactly your deputation is. There are two Home Rule leagues?—There are three altogether.

1439. Whom do you represent?—The first two were formed for a very simple reason. One was formed by Mr. Tilak and one by myself, and the idea was that many people hated him and did not hate me, and many other people hated me and did not hate him, and that, therefore, a difference in organisation would be desirable for the numbers of those who entered. The later division between the All-India Home Rule League, of which I was one of the founders and the president, was simply due to the disagreement about the Gandhi movement, which made me unpopular for the time, and I could not represent their view. I knew they were against me. Secondly, it was due to the fact that its leading members in Bombay, who had the power, were very warm supporters of the Gandhi movement, which I was very much against.

1440. It is a personal following?—No. It is personal, as my movement has been to a large extent personal, only because I touch almost every point of Indian life, and very few other people do that to the same extent; but there was a distinct movement to prevent my coming with the deputation, and I believed that there were large numbers—and I found there were—who very much wished me to come, who urged me to come—and I could only do it by practically forming a new organisation of those who earnestly desired it. It extends all over India and is growing very rapidly. Many of the big officers came with me; but it was personal in that sense that I was very unpopular for a time because I was opposing that movement and, of course, that touched very large numbers of people. It was a popular movement above all other questions.

(After a short adjournment.)

Lord Islington.

1441. In answer to Mr. Spoor, you were talking about Guilds?—Yes.

1442. Those Guilds that you have mentioned I think are in Madras you said?—All over the country.

1443. Do those represent the employer or the employee?—They are hardly divided in the Guilds. Practically, they used to have master workers and apprentices, and it is the master workers who practically have all the power in the Guild. The apprentices work up through that very much in the mediaeval way.

1444. It does not represent the artisan portion of the industry connected with the Guild?—No; it is all hand work that I am speaking of. They are a very powerful body in Madras.

1445. If you had a representative from a Guild in a Legislative Council, he would not necessarily represent the artisan in the industry connected with that Guild?—You cannot make the distinction in a Guild between artisans; it is really a difference of skill—the skilled man and the apprentice who is learning his trade. It is quite different from the real trade union.

1446. Would you favour such a proposal as that those trade unions which you mentioned are now organised having representation in a Provincial Legislative Council?—As such?

1447. Yes?—No; I have never thought of that. I have simply thought as to the workmen, either by a literary vote or a property qualification, coming in until it came to the time when every person had a vote.

1448. You would not care to give an opinion upon that as to whether that would be an effective method of the operative getting his representation in the Legislative Council by having a representative nominated by a trade union to the Legislative Council?—It would mean another special electorate, and the whole trend of my thought is against special electorates, and in favour of territorial. I would sooner that he found his place among voters as a body than as representative of a particular trade.

1449. Then you mentioned, in reply to Major Ormsby-Gore, certain of the Services which are now proposed to be reserved Services becoming transferred Services?—Yes.

1450. Such as revenue and irrigation?—Yes, in the Provinces.

1451. And you gave as your ground for advocating the fact that the taxation connected with those Services pressed chiefly on the people?—Yes.

1452. That would, I take it, point to your desire to see that those people upon whom the taxation presses should have as clearly and definitely as possible a representative in the Legislative Council?—Does your Lordship mean that they should be represented by one of their own class in the Legislative Council? Pardon my asking the question, but my answer depends on it.

1453. Yes. Well, I would say, to the extent of their own class, somebody who would accurately and faithfully represent their interests in the Legislative Council?—Yes.

1454. So that it would be practically the same?—Not quite.

1456. Could you briefly explain to the Committee how you would see that the small land occupier upon whom presses heavily this taxation can be represented under the proposals of the Bill now?—There is not the same difference in India of classes that there is here with different interests. The caste goes straight down through all social classes, and you have a very large number of the peasant proprietors in a village who have relatives in the town, people of their own caste, who are highly educated. That is especially the case—I will take lawyers as a class—they belong to a village; their families belong to a village often; and they are intimately acquainted with every want of the village. One of those might be a much better representative of village interests than a man actually living in the village who had no experience outside the matters with which he is himself concerned. In the Indian caste you may have a prince, and you may have a peasant proprietor, with everything between. You might have an Indian Brahmin of very high rank, and you might have an engine-driver. It is so absolutely different from class here. Therefore you cannot divide interests and castes as you might here interests and classes.

Chairman.

1457. Caste and class are not the same thing?—Not the least; that is the point I wanted to put.

1458. You would say, I suppose, interests that could faithfully and accurately represent the interests of a body of people, whoever is chosen to represent that body must be concerned in the questions connected with that class?—Must know them intimately.

1459. It would be better, would it not, if he was concerned in them as well?—With all respect, I rather doubt that. It seems to me that very often the things that a man may know best are the things of his own life. If his interests are restricted, and in a Provincial Assembly you have to consider this in relation to all other classes that are represented there, it is better to get someone with larger views who deals with the bigger questions of political life. I am trenching a little on a theory which I have no right to put here, which would take the right of representation up from the village, where it would be universal suffrage, up to where it would be more restricted in the higher. That is only my own view, and I do not think it is generally agreed with.

1460. That is a point of view you say from India. You would admit that that is not the actual and accurate democratic principle as embodied in our principle here?—Not for Western democracy; but I think it is largely for Eastern democracy. I do not think it is for Western democracy very much, but that is no loss in many ways.

1461. One word as regards the Central Government. I understand from your answers to Major Ormsby-Gore that you would be quite satisfied, and those for whom you speak would be quite satisfied, if tariff policy, and tariff policy alone, was granted to the Central Assembly?—If by tariff is included Customs and Excise——

1462. Excise is a local matter, is it not?—It is now. I mean Excise duties, which are duties on manufactured articles, putting them on a level with those of foreign producers.

1463. I see what you mean—Excise in connection with external matters?—Yes; not with regard to alcohol. I am taking it for granted in that answer that our education is left completely in the hands of the Provinces according to the functions given. If it is the wish of the Government of India to keep higher education in its own hands, I should very strongly press that that should not be a reserved subject; but I am taking it in the division of functions that we have before us.

1464. I am not quite sure for the moment. You say that the Government of India's subsequent proposal is that higher education should be controlled by the central authority?—Secondary and higher should go into the Centre, and primary alone should be left to the Provinces. If that were carried out, I should be in favour of giving the whole of the education over to the Ministers, and not having it reserved in the higher branches.

1465. You would prefer to see the whole of the education, higher and primary, as a transferred subject in Provincial Government?—I should prefer it so, but if they decided to put any of it in the Centre I should want that to be under the control of the Legislature as well as Customs and Tariffs, and so on.

1466. You think if there is to be any distinction as between the administration of higher and primary education, the higher should be placed in the hands of the Central Government rather than being left as a reserve subject in the hands of the Provincial Government: Is that what I gather?—That has not yet been suggested.

1467. I was only putting it to you because I thought that is what you said?—No; the idea was in the Report of Lord Southborough, that the whole of it should be provincial; that we are satisfied with. But if the later view, the view in 1919 of the Government of India prevailed, that was supported by Sir James Meston, and the higher education were transferred to the Central Government, then I should certainly desire that that should be among the things which should be managed by and responsible to the Central Legislature.

1468. It should, in other words, become a transferred subject?—Yes. I avoided the use of the word because we have not yet diarchy in the Centre.

1469. You were answering several questions that Lord Crewe put to you with regard to the India Office, and I think you said in reply to him that those whom you were speaking for objected to the idea of an Advisory Committee to the Secretary of State?—Yes.

1470. You would like to sweep away the India Council as it now exists, and you would not suggest any substitution of the Advisory Committee?—No.

1471. But you would favour a Select Committee of the House of Commons?—Yes. The abolition of the India Council has been one of the demands of the Congress from the very early days.

1472. Would you favour a Select Committee composed of both Houses?—I think I should prefer one in the House of Commons only, but if there were to be two Committees, one in the House of Commons and one in the House of Lords, then I should prefer it joint.

1473. You would say that on the whole there might be found more people in the House of Lords conversant with Indian matters than has hitherto been the case in the House of Commons?—That is distinctly the case; but conversant with them only from the side of the bureaucracy, if I may use that word, and not taking a view favourable to Indian liberty and Indian progress.

1474. Only from the side of Government?—Quite so.

1475. I suppose you would not disfavour representatives on that Committee who were conversant with the methods of Government?—I should not dream of opposing the presence on that Committee of some representatives of Government who had taken part in the Government, but they would need to be balanced, it seems to me, by some who knew India from the other side.

1476. Have your organisations that you are speaking for considered what would be the work of a Select Committee of that character?—Only very generally, that it would be a Committee before whom could be placed any subject bearing specially on Indian affairs, and to which information might be sent by organised bodies in India of their view of the matter when any special question turned up to be decided in Parliament; in fact, representatives of India to some extent.

1477. You mean matters might be referred to them by the Secretary of State to elicit their opinion?—I was not so much thinking of the Secretary of State as of Indian opinion. It might be conveyed to them through various organised bodies in India, so that they might be seised of the popular idea as well as of the Governmental idea.

1478. And then report to the Secretary of State?—Yes, or to the House of Commons, whatever the arrangement was, but especially they would act as members for India; that was really our idea, I think, rather.

1479. Of course, having done that they would have to make effective their considerations in some form. It would have to go through the ordinary channels to Parliament, and I suppose that channel would be the Secretary of State, would it not?—I presume so.

1480. You said that you accepted for a few years certain subjects being regarded as reserved subjects, as distinguished from transferred?—Yes.

1481. Reserved subjects being those which still remain under the control of Parliament?—Under the control of the Executive Council.

1482. Which still remain under the ultimate control of Parliament?—Yes.

1483. As distinguished from being under the control of the Legislative Council?—That is, an Executive Council would be responsible to Parliament ultimately through the Secretary of State.

1484. I was putting it in the recognised way, that the reserved subject would remain a subject which would be under the control of Parliament?—I suppose ultimately, yes.

1485. Why I put that is because I am going to ask you this question: Which way do you consider Parliament might be most effectively represented as the controlling controlling authority over these reserved subjects—as at present through the control of the Government of India or through the Secretary of State?—For a Local Government?

1486. Yes; reserved subjects in the Provinces. I will put it merely illustratively in a simple way, except that police is a reserved subject, a question in regard to it has to have some official confirming authority beyond that of the Governor and his Council. Would you prefer to see the Government of India retained as that authority as representative of Parliament, or would you prefer to see the Secretary of State as the confirming authority representing Parliament?—I should prefer the Secretary of State.

1487. I gathered from an answer you gave just now, you would like to see all these subjects become transferred in about five years?—I think in the Provinces it might be so.

1488. You would like to see Provincial Government, in other words, become completely autonomous in about five years?—Yes; that is, after two Legislative Councils; it would be six years really, but it is the same thing.

1489. Do you consider in making that proposal that you have fully considered the interests of the European community as you have that of the Indian community, fairly?—I think that the difficulties of the English community will very largely pass away when there is not the feeling in the Indian community that the English are unfairly favoured in all mercantile and commercial matter—matters of concession, matters of purchase, matters of stores, and so on. There are so many of these questions that arise, and great race feeling does grow out of them. I think as soon as the Indians feel they are controlling their own affairs that racial difficulty would disappear.

1490. And you are sanguine enough to feel that the process confined to a period of five years would pass along smoothly, as you suggest?—I think it would.

1491. With fairness to both parties concerned?—I think it would if the English community will make up its mind to accommodate itself to the new conditions, and co-operate with Indians in bringing about mutual good feeling. If they resist, that will be a difficulty; it would make it longer.

Chairman.

1492. I think you told us when you were speaking of the question of woman suffrage that all the Indian Universities gave degrees to women on equal terms with men?—I believe so.

1493. Do you happen to know, roughly speaking, how many women graduates there have been at the Indian Universities?—A very small number, though it is increasing every year. At the first Convocation of the Hindoo University, for instance, there was only one woman graduate. In Bombay I do not know how many there are, though I could easily get the information; in Allahabad there have been several.

1494. My question is directed to this, that this great opportunity has been given to the ladies of India, and I wanted to know to what extent that privilege had been taken advantage of, and I understand your reply to be very little up to the present?—To a small extent, naturally, when the education of girls was confined at first to very young girls, and has needed years in order that anyone may prepare for going to the University, and then the four years of the college course in addition.

1495. You will remember that when you were stating your opinion in favour of the earliest realisation of complete self-government in India, you said it would be very odd if, when all the rest of the world had freed itself from the mechanism of autocracy, autocracy remained only in the Central Government of India?—Yes.

1496. What about the native States?—The Indian States?

1497. Yes?—Autocracy there is being more effectively limited in many ways than under the British raj, for they are establishing one after the other popular assemblies which at present have only power of recommending resolutions; but in such a State as Mysore, and I think also in Baroda, and certainly in Gwalior, these resolutions are very carefully considered, and mostly carried out by the Government. I believe that in the Indian States there is a great movement towards self-government, and that in the larger States, at least, they will very swiftly follow the lead of Great Britain now, as they have already to some extent followed it in their popular assemblies.

Chairman—continued.

1498. Is it not, nevertheless, the fact that, altogether apart from the Government of India, there are more autocratic Governments in India at the present moment than anywhere else in the world?—Completely autocratic, no—not nearly so autocratic as the British. In the larger Indian States—I am not talking about the small States, because those do remain very autocratic—the popular assembly, though not nominally with power to make laws, makes them to a very large extent, and the Ministers of such a State are Ministers responsible to the Chief, but he is guided almost completely by their advice. The progress of Mysore has been more by its Prime Ministers than by its Monarch.

1499. You speak of the great growth of political consciousness in India?—Yes.

1500. What is lacking is, is it not, personal experience of government?—Of the higher posts of India that is lacking, because, of course, Indians have not been admitted to them until quite lately. The whole of the administration, which is so important in carrying out the ordinary business, is already in the hands of the Indian Service, who practically do the practical work, but the power of direction remains in the hands of the English officers. That is one reason, of course, why Indians so constantly go into the Indian State, because there they can have real power.

1501. I am aware of that. Of course, government may be split up into various parts, that is, the part, for instance, which the Civil Service performs here?—Yes.

1502. Indians have much experience in that already in India, apart from the native State?—Yes.

1503. I am alluding only to what you may call the higher functions of the Government, as shown in Ministers and members of Legislatures who may become Ministers; that is the experience that is at present lacking in India?—That is lacking in India, but in every case where they have been appointed they have shown the capacity to fill the functions of their office.

1504. I was not asking about capacity. I wanted to confine myself to the question of experience?—Yes.

1505. Do you know any case in history where the transition from autocracy to self-government has been made successfully otherwise than by stages?—I do not know of any in which it has been made by stages, except the very limited experience of British Colonies—people of the same stock as the English. Wherever else it has been made it has been made by revolution, and that is what we are trying to avoid. I do not know of any case by stages, which seems to me the only way except revolution, and I cannot think of any case where it has been done.

1506. Surely that is rather a sweeping statement?—I only say I do not at the moment remember any State.

1507. Taking the history of England, part of the stages have been revolutionary, but a great many have not been revolutionary?—No. What I said was that I did not think there was experience of stages except in the Colonies, which are of the same stock as the English people themselves. In all other cases at the moment I can remember the change from autocracy to responsible government has been the result of a revolution—of force, I mean.

1508. I am not using the word stage as a constitutional enactment; I am merely using it in this sense, that the transition has been gradual; sometimes shorter, sometimes longer; never successfully sudden?—Could your Lordship give me one case, because, frankly, I cannot remember any case where this has been done?

1509. I cannot remember a case where it has not been done?—There are too many cases in Europe today, my Lord.

1510. Taking the last case, Russia—that was a very sudden transition; you would admit that?—Surely; I call that revolution.

1511. But

1511. But that was not successful, was it?—It is impossible to say as yet.

1512. At present it is not successful?—At present it is in the stage of struggles, as the French Revolution was for long.

1513. That, again, was a sudden transition, and that was, I venture to say, unsuccessful. It was not until they began the process of gradual evolution that it became successful?—Any people who have been starved and tyrannised over for centuries, when they throw off an autocracy, is sure to be unsuccessful for a time; but ultimately successful, I hope.

1514. My question is not directed to the Indian people otherwise than it is directed to the one race, and I ask you if you know any case in history where the people have by one sudden leap, successfully passed from a political status, in which they had no power of self-government, into one in which they had an un-controlled power of self-government?—My answer to that is, it has never been tried. I think there are only two ways: gradual reform and revolution, and I elect gradual reform, and therefore desire this Bill.

1515. You are in agreement with me thus far, that the proper path is gradual reform?—Certainly.

1516. Perhaps we should not agree altogether what revolution has been successful, and therefore we will not pursue that?—It is only that there are only those two ways, and I say the way of gradual reform has never been tried, so far as I know, outside the Colonies.

1517. Have you ever known a case in which the gradual reform has been successfully accomplished in five years?—My Lord, I have said it has never yet been tried, and we cannot tell.

1518. There is no example that you know of?—There is none, because it has never been attempted.

1519. You made a very interesting observation, I think, in answer to Mr. Spoor, that when the Indian people have complete control over their destinies they will work out a form of self-governing constitution different from the Western model?—Yes; I think so.

1520. You feel pretty confident of that?—Yes; I feel fairly confident.

1521. And that that constitution of native growth is more likely to be successful than one engrafted on them with the best intentions by Westerns?—I think so. It is a philosophical speculation rather, but is based on history.

1522. I venture entirely to agree. I have only one further question to ask, and that is in connection with the Committee of the House of Commons, which, I think you said, in answer to Lord Islington, you thought would be advantageous?—Yes.

1523. As I understand your description of it, it amounted to a House of Commons Committee, which was not very much distinguishable from an administrative Department?—No; I was not thinking of it in that way at all.

1524. Then I misunderstood you. You do not propose that it should have any powers of administration?—None.

1525. Then what would its function exactly be?—I thought of it as a means of receiving communications from India on Indian questions, so as to be able to form gradually a kind of bureau of information on Indian affairs, which might give an instructed and informed opinion to the House when Indian questions came up for debate.

1526. Might there be a danger of this result, that you would have two bureaux of Indian information, of one of which the Secretary of State was the head in the India Office, which had a permanent existence without break of continuity, and another one which consisted of a Committee of the House of Commons, the personnel of which might be almost entirely changed as the result of a General Election, and these two bodies might have different opinions and advise the Government very differently?—Would there be any harm in that?

1527. It would be rather disconcerting to the Government, do not you think?—Not necessarily. The Secretary of State would have to defend his position, and the Select Committee, composed of ordinary members of the House, would put forward what would probably be the popular view of India, and that would be represented for the decision of the whole of the House.

1528. Of course, it is a matter of opinion as to whether that would be welcomed by the Government of the day—to have two such bodies. Have you given sufficient attention to the fact that I indicated, that the body might change constantly?—It would last through from election to election, would not it?

1529. Yes, it would, barring ordinary casualties?—It need not necessarily change more than the Government.

1530. Well, if you think the extreme fluctuations of political fortunes that have been seen in the House of Commons in the last thirty years—I will take only two instances, the General Election of 1906 and the General Election of 1918, when there really was almost a clean sweep of one whole political party—that would affect the continuity and the value of such a Committee very much, would not it?—It is not a question, I think, on which I have sufficient knowledge to give a good opinion, but I do not see why it should be more inconvenient than the change of policy in the whole of Great Britain made by this great sweep from time to time of popular opinion, because the Indian questions would be less affected by political differences here than any other question would be.

Chairman.] Thank you very much, Mrs. Besant.

(The Witness is directed to withdraw.)

The Hon. MR. C. P. RAMASWAMI AIYAR is called in; and Examined, as follows:—

Chairman.

1531. You are Vice-President of the All-India Home Rule League?—Yes.

1532. And you have been good enough to give us answers to the questions that we put to you?—Yes. They are as follows:—

1. Do you accept the proposition that it is desirable to bring about the progressive realisation of responsible government in India, and, if so, how do you define the expression "responsible government"? And do you, generally, accept the proposition contained in the Preamble?—I accept the proposition that it is desirable to bring about the progressive realisation of responsible government in India. I would define responsible government as involving the responsibility of the Executive for their policy and administration to a representative Legislature. I would accept the proposition contained in the Preamble, provided that the development of responsibility in the Central Government is prescribed by it and contemplated in Clause 28, Sub-Clause 2, and if the first steps in such development are provided for in the statute.

Chairman—continued.

2. Do you think that the realisation of responsible government in the Provinces involves the establishment in Provincial Legislatures of a substantial elected majority (Clause 6.)?—The realisation of responsible government cannot be achieved, except, inter alia, by the establishment in Provincial Legislature of a substantial elected majority. This demand has been unanimous on the part of Indian politicians, and a four-fifths majority has been asked for.

3. Do you think that the non-official members of the Provincial Legislatures should possess power to control the actions and policy of the Executive? Do you think they possess such power at present?—The non-official members of the Provincial Legislature, on account of the existing composition of the Councils and in the present circumstances, possess no real power, either in the matter of legislation or by way of exercising any control over the actions and policy of the Executive, and the resolutions of the Legislatures have mostly remained a dead letter. There is no possibility of development, unless actual power is conferred on the Provincial Councils.

4. Do you think that there are certain matters or functions of government in the Provinces in which, at present, the Provincial Executive must remain responsible to the Secretary of State and Parliament, and must, therefore, be in a position to enforce its wishes?—The majority of the members of the organisation whose delegate I am concurs with the Indian National Congress in the view that in the Provinces full responsible government should be immediately granted on the lines suggested by the Delhi Congress. However, as a matter of practical politics, and in view of the discussions that have taken place on this matter, and the opinions expressed by several non-official organisations, as well as by exponents of the Government's policy, I would state as my conclusion that the Provincial Executive may be placed in a position to enforce its wishes, subject to its responsibility to the Secretary of State in Parliament, and subject to full facilities for popular influence being brought to bear on it before the final decision is taken. This is in relation to certain matters and some functions of government, namely, those concerned with the preservation of the peace and safety of the Provinces and political matters.

5. If you accept the propositions stated under questions 1 to 4, do you think that the dual form of government embodied in the Bill is the best means of securing them? If not, what are your objections to that feature of the Bill, and by what other means would you attempt to secure the objects in view?—Having accepted propositions 1 to 4, as stated above, it is my duty to inform the Joint Committee that, so far as I have been able to gather their views, the majority of members of the All-India Home Rule League cherish the opinion that the dual form of government is unacceptable, and that, in any case, some Provinces at least are ripe for complete Provincial autonomy. Here, again, for the following reasons, I would for the present accept the dual form of government. My reasons are these:—The Congress League scheme was attacked on the ground of its not providing any scope for the exercise of definite and undivided responsibility by popular representatives, and of its inevitable deadlocks. Whilst not admitting the argument as to deadlocks in its entirety, it has yet been felt that the grant and exercise of real responsibility are bound to convince the authorities in England and India that Indians are capable of managing their own affairs, and that the conviction will lead to complete self-government and demonstrate that it is neither against the genius of the race nor will tend to the enthronement of a class oligarchy. This decision is due, mainly, to the safeguards proposed by the Joint Report, namely, that the two parts of Government would meet and decide all important subjects, and that all Orders will issue in the name of the whole Government; that the Budget will be a unified one, that taxation would be transferred, and would be in charge of the Minister. These safeguards remove many of the objections that may be urged against the dual system, especially when it is considered that it is meant to be transitional. The Government of India's recommendations, in their letter of the 5th March, 1919, regarding (a) the choice of civilian Governors, (b) the insistence on two European members of the Executive Council where the Governor is a stranger, (c) the suggested partition of finances, (d) the powerlessness of the Legislative Council as to Budget resolutions, (e) the possibility of taxation proposals being dealt with by the Grand Committee, (f) the administration by the Governor of Transferred Departments and their re-transfer in certain cases, (g) the elimination of the provision as to a fresh transfer of subjects on the expiry of five years, (h) the composition of the Grand Committee, and (j) the Governor's power to certify bills on transferred subjects, completely alter the complexion of affairs and make diarchy absolutely unworkable. These proposals are universally regarded as an attempt to whittle down the scheme, and the proposals will be unacceptable if these modifications are given effect to, but if the plan of the Joint Report is adhered to, I would support diarchy on the ground that a discussion de novo would result in a delay which is fatal to the success of any scheme of reform, and because I appreciate that, under the scheme as originally contemplated, the Minister and the Legislative Council not only control the transferred subjects, but have by means of the Budget and the common deliberation on all subjects, considerable, though not predominating, influence over the administration of reserved subjects.

6. If you have any other method to suggest, does it (i) provide possibilities of advance by stages and facilitate the "progressive realisation of responsible government," and, if it does, in what way (Clause 2, 3, etc.)? And (ii) does it afford means of judgment (a) to the electors and (b) to the Statutory Commission which is to examine and report on progress, of the success or failure in results of the control exercised by the Legislature and those who represent it in the Executive?—In the view I have adopted I have no alternative method to suggest, but in my opinion the next best is the Bombay Government scheme contained in its letter printed at page 188 of the Blue Book, C.M.D. 123. For an answer to the second part of the question I would refer to paragraphs 18, 19, and 20 of the letter adverted to.

7. If you consider a dual form of government, acceptable in principle, are there any points of detail the modification of which you regard as necessary? If so, what are those points, and what modifications would you suggest?—Accepting as I do the priciple of dual government during the period of transition, I regard modification necessary in the following points of detail. These remarks must be read along with the suggestions detailed below:—

(1) The responsibility for the rules must rest directly with His Majesty's Government, and they should be made by His Majesty in Council, as suggested by Professor Keith; certain classes of rules under Clause 30 may be exempt from alteration by the Indian Legislature; but matters of detail or procedure may be subject to their legislation under the safeguards provided therefor. In any case, all rules should be published in India before promulgation.

(2) Legislative bodies should be at liberty to alter their rules for the conduct of business unconnected with their fundamental constitution. Rules must provide for vacancies in legislative bodies being filled up within a specified period, and for meetings to be convened on the requisition of a proportion of members of these bodies.

(3) No discrimination is necessary as to their terms of office and the prolongation of their terms between the Provincial Councils and the Legislative Assembly.

(4) The Minister, in virtue of his position, must be the nominal leader of the House and the exponent of Government's policy.

(5) Standing committees and under secretaries must be provided for as contemplated in the Report, both in the Local Government and the Government of India.

(6) The Deputy Governorships are unnecessary, and may lead to complications and popular suspicion.

(7) The Bill leaves open the question of a separate or joint purse, but seems to proceed on the basis of not accepting the doctrine laid down in the report as to the transferred subjects being the residuaries. In either case the Governor's final mediation and decision are requisite (vide answer to Question 132), and the success of either experiment is dependent on the mutual cordiality and tact of the authorities concerned (vide paragraph 221 of the Report). Considering that the Ministers who seek responsibility ought not to avoid the so-called odium of taxation, and in view of the preponderating advantages indicated by Sir Sankaran Nair, of collective action and mutual influence resulting from the joint purse system and the restraining influence of the periodical review by the future Commission, as well as the opportunity granted to Ministers for understanding the needs of the reserved subjects, and the chances obtained by the Executive Council of understanding the needs of the transferred subjects, I would urge the adoption of the joint purse system. The powers of the Governor will enable him to safeguard guard the interests of reserve departments. The alternative course would tend to separate the two halves of the Government, may encourage extravagance on the part of both halves, and the fixed periodical adjustments suggested by Government would, as pointed out by Lord Islington, stereotype the position of particular departments. Moreover, taxation may be resorted to, even though there is a surplus in one of the two halves of the Government (vide Question 400 and answer). As suggested by Sir Sankaran Nair, the Executive Government as a whole will apportion the revenue between the reserved and transferred subjects, and the Budget so framed will be placed before the Legislature.

(8) The rules under Clause 5, Sub-Clause 2, must provide that the whole Executive Government should generally deliberate as a whole.

8. In particular, do you think (1) that the Ministers should hold office "during pleasure"?—i.e., should be liable to removal if they are unable to support the action decided upon in their Department by the Governor, or if they fail to retain the confidence of the Legislature (Clause 3 (i))? (ii) That the Governor should have power to disregard the opinion of his Ministers, if he considers that action in accordance with that opinion is inconsistent with the due discharge of his responsibilities (Clause 3 (3))? (iii) That the Executive Council should, in all Provinces, normally consist of one official European and one non-official Indian (Clause 4)? (iv) That the Governor should have power to dissolve his Legislative Council (Clause 7 (4))?—(i) Ministers should hold office during pleasure in the sense that they should vacate office if they fail to retain the confidence of the Legislature. This suggestion carries out the demand for real responsibility; but, as a corollary, it must follow that the Governor should be bound to accept the decisions of the Minister. If he is, however, to be under the obligation to take action, as indicated in Clause 3, Sub-Clause 3, then, as suggested by Professor Keith at page 45 of his Minute, he ought to have liberty to acquiesce in the Governor's decision, but to decline responsibility for it, and remain in office if he has the confidence of the Legislature. Clause 3 of the Bill would have to be amended so as not to compel the Minister to carry out a policy to which he is opposed but for which nominally he is to be responsible.

(ii.) The power referred to under this question should be vested in the Governor, subject to the following safeguards: If he disregards the opinion of his Ministers and is unable to find a successor to carry out his views, he may dissolve the Council, and if the new Council also follows the opinion of the old, the Governor must yield to their will without being enabled to resume the transferred subjects. If this be not accepted, the following safeguards should be adopted:—(a) All disputes between a Minister and a Governor as to the nature of subjects reserved or transferred, and as to action to be taken as regards transferred matters in consequence of action taken in reserved matters, and vice versa, should be referred, if so desired by the Minister, to the decision of the Secretary of State. (b) A Governor should not, without the approval of the Secretary of State, decline to accept the advice of a Minister in regard to a transferred subject unless he can obtain another Minister prepared to accept responsibility for the policy laid down by the Governor. The approval of the Secretary of State to be accorded only when he is satisfied that, in the interests of India or the Empire, the control of the transferred subjects should for the time being revert to the Governor in Council (vide Professor Keith's Minute, pp. 46, 47). As connected with this topic, each branch of the Government should have analogous and equal powers of interfering with the other half.

(iii.) As to this question, I would stick to the formula in paragraph 218 of the Report, as the preponderance of the European element would be a whittling down of the scheme (vide Sir Sankaran Nair's Minute, para. 26). After the appointment of Ministers the need for increasing the number of the Executive Council would grow less.

(iv.) The Governor's power to dissolve the Legislative Council is consequent on the other features of the scheme and inauguration of a responsible Ministry.

9. Referring back to questions 2, 3 and 4, if your answers to the first and third of these are in the affirmative, and if you think that the Legislatures should be given greater powers of control and influence than they possess at present, do you regard the limitations imposed generally by Clause 9 of the Bill upon their financial and legislative powers as (i) suitable, or as (ii) unnecessarily severe, or as (iii) inadequate to safeguard the responsibilities which the Government owes in the last resort to Parliament (Clause 9)?—Holding, as I do, that the Legislatures should be given greater powers of control and influence than they possess at present, I regard the limitations imposed by Clause 9 of the Bill as unnecessarily severe, and such as to jeopardise the success of the scheme. Sub-Clause 5, endowing the Governor with the power to throttle legislation is novel, and is greater than the powers possessed by the Governor-General himself. He may veto legislation, but the prevention of discussion will be most harmful in its results, and this provision eliminates the privilege that a private member has even now in theory. The appeal to the Governor-General against a certificate of a Governor must also be retained or an appeal provided to the Secretary of State. As to the legislative power of the Councils, paragraph 212 of the Report must be adhered to. The rules regarding Provincial Legislation suggested by Professor Keith in pages 45 and 46 of his Minute are very appropriate, with the exception of the provision regarding the interests of parts of the Empire other than India. The re-enactment of Section 79, Sub-Section 3, Item E of the Government of India Act is uncalled for. There are a number of legislative changes, as in the case of religious endowments, and many departments of Hindoo law, in which the conditions of one Province differ from those in another, and where public opinion has evolved on different lines. Uniformity of legislation in such cases is neither possible nor desirable. Catastrophic changes can be prevented by a resort to prior sanction. Financial proposals: The proposals contained in paragraph 256 of the Report are regarded in India as the kernel of the scheme in its provincial part, and ought not to be minimised. The proposals made by the Government of India, in their Dispatch of the 5th March, paragraph 69, would reduce the Councils to the position of mere advisory bodies in all subjects reserved and transferred. Clause 9, Sub-Clause 2b, gives an extraordinary power, and the words relating to expenditure necessary for the carrying on of any Department practically gives him an unlimited scope. In any case, even in emergencies, the Governor must certify, with reasons, and the approval of the Secretary of State must be obtained, whenever the Governor issues a certificate in respect of expenditure on a reserved subject which has been disapproved by the Legislature, or to authorise expenditure for some purpose for which no provision has been submitted to or approved by the Legislature. Clause 9, Sub-Clause 2c, contravenes paragraph 256 of the Report, and overlooks the educative efficacy of the annual Budget discussion referred to therein. The permanent charges should be few, and fixed by statutory rules, and should include only a few items beyond, provincial contributions and interest on debt. Prov. D., Clause 9, Sub-Clause 2, is based on the House of Commons procedure; but there is no real analogy, as the House, by an adverse vote, can turn out the Government, and, moreover, the Committee procedure secures the possibility of alteration of specific heads. The Legislature should not merely have a right of scrutiny and advice, and further, it ought to be possible to propose financial measures in the form of resolutions, even though they may involve increase of expenditure under one head. There ought to be no emergency grants which can form proper subjects for supplementary estimates.

10. In particular—(i.) Do you think that the Legislature should have power, with whatever limitations, to vote supplies (Clause 9 (2))? (ii.) Do you accept the plan of Grand Committees as the means of giving to the Government the power to secure essential legislation in the event of their failure to carry their propositions in the Council? If so, have you any modifications of detail to suggest? If not, what other method would you suggest to secure the object in view?—(i.) The right of voting supplies is essential to any Legislature if responsibility, however limited, is to be exercised by it. (ii.) Grand Committees: I would oppose the institution of Grand Committees, especially in view of the suggestions made by the Government of India, which proceed on the erroneous basis of the absence of independent political thought and of the assumption that every elected member will vote against the Government. The disadvantage of the official bloc has been perpetuated, and smaller bodies than even the present Councils are brought into existence. It has been argued that the Grand Committee affords scope for persuasion on the part of the elected member, but this process can take place in the Council itself without a reduplication of machinery. The Grand Committee may be abolished, and the Governor may assume responsibility for cases needing affirmative legislation, subject to sanction on the part of the Government of India or the Secretary of State, and the inevitable review of policy by the Select Committee and Commission. In the alternative, I would advocate action by the Imperial Legislative Assembly, for the reasons outlined by Sir Sankaran Nair at page 72 of his Minutes. Protection to Government can be combined with opportunity of persuasion by the non-officials only if the composition of the body is such as to secure a bare majority of nominated members (vide para. 252 of the Report), and if, as suggested by Professor Keith, the approval of the Secretary of State is requisite for reference by certification to a Grand Committee, or, at all events, the appeal provided against the certificate in para. 252 of the Report is retained. There must also be a provision inserted for a discussion by the Council after the work of the Grand Committee (vide para. 253 of Report).

11. Do you accept the position adopted in the Bill (Part II.) that the time has not yet come to give the Legislative Assembly a similar measure of control over the Central Government as that given to Provincial Legislative Councils over Provincial Governments?—I do not accept the position adopted in the Bill, especially in the preamble and section 28, taken with part 2, as to the Central Government, as I hold that the terms of the announcement of Government require, as well as empower, an advance towards a responsible Government at the top. I hold that the Bill not only makes no advance, but crystallises the present system, and even the Statutory Commission is not under any obligation to inquire into the subject (vide Clause 28, Sub-Clauses 2 and 3). There is no reason why in most matters which concern the normal internal administration of the country, and especially in all those cases where the Government of India retain a right to interfere with the transferred subjects in the Provinces, responsibility should not be introduced as outlined by Sir Sankaran Nair (vide p. 73 of his Minutes).

12, 13, and 14. Do you agree that it is advisable none the less to provide for a substantial elective majority in the Indian Legislature (Clause 16)? Do you accept the plan of a bi-cameral Legislature as arising out of this, as constituting both a satisfactory machine for the ordinary purposes of legislation and as affording the means to the Governor-General in Council to secure legislation which he regards as essential (Clauses 14, 15, and 16)? Do you accept the provisions of the Bill as to the course of legislation in the Indian Legislature (Clause 20 (3) and (4)), or do you regard them as unnecessarily restrictive on the popular will, or as an inadequate means of ensuring to the Governor-General in Council the discharge of his responsibilities?—In any case a substantial elected majority is essential in the Legislative Assembly, so as to allow of the exercise of influence at a place where the country's future will be really in the making. I consider Clause 20, Sub-Clauses 3 and 4 unnecessarily restrictive of the popular will, and I would also press for the principle advocated in the Crewe Report, para. 35, Clause 2. The examination and criticism of the expenditure of the Government of India by the Legislative Assembly must be on the basis that the resolutions are valid and binding subject to the conditions indicated in Professor Keith's Minute, para. 17, Sub-Clauses 3 and 4. For the reasons that the Council of State, as constituted, does not represent interests unrepresented in the Assembly otherwise, and as at present no real Senatorial Chamber can be constituted, a procedure analagous to the Grand Committee should for the present be followed in all cases where the Council of State is deemed necessary. If it is, however, decided that it is necessary to constitute such a Council, it ought not to be resorted to for ordinary purposes of legislation, and its interference must be only in cases of paramount importance, and legislation should not be certified for enactment by it alone, or as against the Legislative Assembly, unless the Secretary of State approved of it on the ground that its enactment is essential for the peace and order of India. Such legislation should be temporary, and not renewable without the approval of the Select Committee. In any case, the words in Clause 20, Sub-Clause 4, regarding the interests of British India, or any part thereof, are dangerously wide and vague.

15. Do you accept the changes made by the Bill (Clause 21) in the constitution of the Governor-General's Executive Council? If not, what are your reasons, and what modifications would you suggest?—I do not accept the proposals in the Bill regarding the constitution of the Governor-General's Executive Council, and would advocate that one-half the number of members in it should be Indian, so as to provide for adequate Indian influence in the Government of India, which at present is ultimately bureaucratic. Subject to this remark I would, for the reasons stated in paragraph 271 of the Report, approve of the abolition of statutory restrictions as to service in India and as to special qualifications. At all events, the clause about legal qualifications should admit of a wider choice, as indicated in the answer of Sir James Meston.

16. Do you think that the development of Provincial autonomy on the one hand, and of self-government in the Provinces on the other, involves any modification of the provisions of Sections 2, 33, and 45 of the Government of India Act (Clause 23)?—In the first place, the question of fiscal autonomy must be faced and answered, either by a frank concession by the Government of the United Kingdom, or at least in the form suggested by the Crewe Report regarding non-interference by the Secretary of State when the Government and the Legislative Assembly are in agreement, but bearing in mind that the interests of the self-governing dominions of the Empire may not be identical with Indian interests. This is essential for industrial progress in India, in view of competition from protected countries, in its present comparatively unorganised condition. Nextly, Sections 2, 33 and 45 of the 1915 Act create an essentially centralised system, and the adoption of devolution of power must involve their modification in the manner attempted by Mr. Basu in paragraph 5 of his Minute, page 32, and by Professor Keith in his Minute, paragraphs 24, 25 and 26.

17. Do you agree that the gradual realisation of responsible government involves periodical examination of progress by independent authority, and that the provisions of Clause 28 of the Bill are well designed to afford such examination?—Whilst agreeing that periodical examination by an independent Parliamentary body is essential for the scheme as laid down, I object to Clause 28, as not imposing any obligation of inquiry into the machinery of Central Government. I would also urge the retention of the provision regarding the inquiry contemplated in paragraph 260 of the Report as essential by way of stock-taking.

18. Are there any matters which it is proposed in the Bill to deal with by rule which you would suggest should be provided for in the Bill?—I would answer this question in the affirmative, and ask that the following matters should be provided for in the Bill:—(1) The powers, inter se, of the various constitutional stitutional authorities and the limits of their interference "vide the Crewe Report." (2) The question of fiscal autonomy, namely, the provision that, subject to just Imperial obligations, the Government of India, under the control of its Legislature, should have the same power over the fiscal policy of India as the Governments of the self-governing Dominions. (3) In view of the past history of the question, the principles should be laid down that Provincial contributions must be in proportion to population or revenue, and not arbitrarily fixed. (4) The salary and position of the Minister should be defined, so as to be on an equal footing with those of his official colleagues. (5) Legislative bodies must be empowered to elect their President and Vice-President. (6) Governors should be recruited from the ranks of public men in the United Kingdom. (7) The fundamental rights of members of the various legislative bodies regarding discussion and interpellation should be enacted, and matters of detail should be regulated by Standing Orders or rules. (8) Part 4 of the Bill to be amended so as to subject the public services to legislation subject to safeguards as contemplated in paragraph 28 of Professor Keith's Minute. (9) The provision of a permanent Indian Under-Secretary of State.

19. Have you any observations to offer on the Reports of Lord Southborough's Committees and of the Committee on the Home Administration of Indian Affairs?—Report of the Committee on the Home Administration of Indian Affairs.—I am in favour of the abolition of the Secretary of State's Council, and consider the Advisory Committee, as recommended, will detract from the undivided responsibility of the Secretary of State, who, in future, will only interfere in matters of Imperial concern. I would accept the views of Sir James Brunyate, contained on pages 21 and 24 of his Minute, regarding the classification of functions and the grouping of topics. If the Secretary of State's Council is retained, it should be as a temporary measure, and, as Sir James Brunyate puts it, it should automatically come to an end at the end of ten years, unless the Parliamentary Commission reports in favour of its continuance. In the intervening period its reconstitution, as suggested by Mr. Basu, is extremely necessary, so that half the number may be Indians, and so as to get recruitment of public men from the United Kingdom. The appointment of a High Commissioner may be postponed until the abolition of the Council; but if he is appointed he must have an Advisory Committee, of whom not less than one-half should be Indians. I would strongly press for the retention of the Select Parliamentary Committee, and would advocate the appointment of an additional Indian Permanent Under-Secretary. Interference by Parliament is unlikely in ordinary affairs, and it will be an advantage to have at least a few British politicians in Parliament who will be obliged to devote their attention to Indian affairs in a responsible manner.

Franchise Report.—Whilst generally agreeing with the Committee's recommendations as to the Provinces, I would object to residential qualification for candidates, and I would strongly urge the extension of franchise to women on the same terms and subject to the same conditions as men. I would preserve the Congress League Compact as to Mahommedan representation in all Provinces. I would advocate the introduction of direct election to the Legislative Assembly from the very start. Provision should be made for the inclusion in the electoral list of persons possessing a minimum educational qualification, such as those who have passed a specified examination. The number would not thereby be greatly enlarged. I urge this for the reasons laid down in paragraph 225 of the Report. The University seats should not be abolished, but the election must be by the registered graduates of each University, and European representation is excessive, especially in Bengal and Bombay, and disproportionate even to their admitted importance. In regard to the non-Brahmin communities separate communal electorates are both uncalled for and mischievous.

As to this, all will echo the sentiments expressed by the Committee that it was regrettable that no settlement was reached which would have dispelled the doubts entertained by this community. The existence of the so-called non-Brahmin movement, which has become more and more thoroughly organised owing to the activities of those interested in the progress of the movement, both in England and India, demonstrates:—(a) That the Indian non-Brahmin communities are not disposed to accept the so-called predominance of the Brahmins without cavil or question, and that there is no spirit of subservience manifested towards an oligarchy, and that (b) they are beginning to recognise their own strength and assert their independence.

It will also be noticed that the political classes amongst the Brahmins are just those who have lost or abdicated their claims to spiritual eminence.

The difficulties experienced by these communities are grossly exaggerated, and the arguments based largely on accidental rather than permanent causes. One of the main arguments of those who want special electorates for this class is that, though the non-Brahmins are in a large minority, yet in the Madras Legislative Council to-day nine out of ten elective seats are held by Brahmins. This argument overlooks the fact that four out of nine seats were, as a matter of fact, uncontested, the fifth was contested only as between a European and a Brahmin, and in the case of another seat—namely, that representing the Corporation of Madras, the Brahmin candidate was put forward and supported by the late Dr. Nair as against a non-Brahmin colleague of his.

Another argument has been, and will be, introduced, namely, that unless there are special electorates created, those non-Brahmins who are favourable to the Brahmins—the so-called "pro-Brahmins"—will be returned; but this involves a conspiracy between the so-called oppressors and the majority of the oppressed. In view of the fact that the community has an overwhelming electoral strength, and of the considerations referred to in the Franchise Report, it is wrong to think of any solution involving the disintegration of the communities, especially as segregation is not the way to protect them. A large number of persons, including myself, have, nevertheless, favoured a compromise based on the creation of plural constituencies with a certain proportion of guaranteed non-Brahmin seats or a maximum imposed on Brahmins; but this is a matter for a compromise and compact, just as was arrived at in Lucknow between the Congress and the Muslim League.

In the matter of the demand for communal representation the main argument has been that the highest castes, and especially the Brahmins, will be oblivious to the interests of the masses. The stress laid by the elected members of all Legislative Councils on the improvement of the administration, on the improvement of gaols, and the amelioration of famine conditions, disproves this contention. The proposal was made by a non-official member of the Madras Legislative Council for the abolition of punishment by "stocks" in the case of certain depressed classes. The statute referred to was a standing instance of Governmental discrimination between castes.

In a smaller sphere it is a fact that, whereas the Elected Commissioners of the Corporation of Madras unanimously voted last year in favour of the admission of Panchamas into Corporation schools, the proposal was postponed owing to the opposition of a representative of the Department of Public Instruction.

As pointed out in the Franchise Report, the Brahmin community does not desire to be segregated, and objects to the assumption that the majority of the population desires not only to be protected from a small minority, but that steps should be taken to prevent the minority from influencing the body politic. If real power is granted, and if the system of communal representation is to be extended, each special caste of the non-Brahmins would insist on separate representation, and a perusal of Mr. Thurston's "Castes and Tribes in Southern India" would convince anyone that the various sub-communities amongst them are by no means united or homogeneous.

Functions Report.—The Minister's salary must be on the transferred estimates, and permanent heads of Departments should not be allowed direct access to the Governor, as suggested by the Indian Government. Revocation or suspension of the transfer of subjects during the first five years ought not to be attempted, and reliance must be placed on the power of ordering a dissolution and of making ordinances.

Provincial taxation and borrowing on the sole credit of Provincial revenues, land revenue in Ryotwari Provinces (vide Sir Sankaran Nair's Minutes, pages 10 and 11, Functions Despatch), must be transferred subjects as well as the subject of periodical settlements, so long as they persist. The present system of executive action and rule making without reference to the Legislature as to land revenue must be altered. Irrigation, light railways and tramways, industrial matters, business concerns, the administration of civil justice, and, most of all, the subject of education, must be transferred; and it is felt that, in education especially, progress is impossible without popular support and control, and wide support and the necessary money cannot be procured unless the control of the system is vested in popular representatives.

List of All-Indian and Provincial Subjects.—(1) Franchises and elections must be left to Provincial Councils to be worked under statutory rules. (2) The control of services working the Departments to be administered by Ministers must be a transferred subject. In short, the tests applied for transfer must be those indicated in the Report—namely, keenness of interest evinced in them, opportunities of service and adequate knowledge.

1533. Would you like to make any general statement as to the attitude of those you represent in respect of the Government of India Bill, which we are met to consider?—Yes, my Lord. I should preface what I have to say by one statement that I am here as a delegate of the All-India Home Rule League, who have deputed me to represent their general views. I may at once preface my remarks by saying that in one important particular I hold what may be termed the minority view in the All-India Home Rule League, and my League was cognisant of that when I was deputed. I hold that, under the present circumstances, in view of the discussions that have taken place, the system of diarchy is inevitable, and has to be worked upon in order to effect the objects that the Government of Great Britain and we have in view. Subject to that, I believe that my views will represent those of the members of my League. Having said so much, I may say that the main points upon which I wish to concentrate, having regard to what has been stated by previous witnesses, would be first the question of communal representation, especially in Madras, with which I am particularly acquainted, being a resident of Madras, and being also a member of that community, namely, the Brahmin, which has come in for a considerable amount of criticism during the very recent discussions on this matter; also, being a lawyer, a class, or community, which has come in for an equal amount of criticism, and having taken a considerable part in helping to form an adequate body of what may be called instructed opinion on this matter in my own Presidency. I may mention in passing that I should also like to offer special remarks regarding the University representation to the Legislative Council. Those are the two local matters on which I should like to offer some observations, or answer questions. I have, in my answers to questions in paragraph 7, stated what modifications I consider necessary in the Bill, and in answer to that question and the next question I deal with most of the points relating to the Provincial Governments. I will deal with them in answer to questions, or generally. If your Lordship desires me to give a general outline of what I would propose as the necessary modifications in this Bill in the various stages of Government I would gladly do so.

1534. I think that would be useful?—Firstly, with reference to the Local Governments I hold the view, which has already been expressed by the witnesses here, that the Minister must be placed in a position of equality so far as status and influence is concerned with the Executive Council members. I also hold the view that, as to the matters on which the Minister is to exercise his jurisdiction, they are to comprise not only the matters already recommended before you as the share of the responsible part in the Government by the Functions Committee, but also the subject of land revenue, industries and education. I ought to correct myself, because the Functions Committee has really dealt with the question of education. In regard to franchise, I hold the view very strongly that it is not an impossible, nor even an inconvenient, procedure at the present moment to give a franchise for women on the same terms and subject to the same conditions as for men. I would also advocate that the residential qualification should not be insisted on in any portion of the country. Those are the two main points with reference to the franchise that I would urge. The other points are referred to in my answers to the questions. They are contained in my answer to question 19, and I think it is that I would object to residential qualification for candidates, and I would strongly urge the extension of the franchise to women on the same terms, and subject to the same conditions, as men. I would preserve the Congress League compact as to Mohammedan representation in all Provinces. In regard to the non-Brahmin communities, I have stated that the constitution of seperate communal electorates for them would be undesirable, and would really give rise to more fissiparous tendencies than already exist in that community. In the first place, as has been noted already by a witness who has given evidence, there is no such thing as a non-Brahmin community from the point of view of homogeneity. If there is no such community, and if real power and influence are going to be exercised by the Legislative bodies, the grant of a communal electorate will mean an agitation in each sub-section of that community for separate representation, because it would be quite open to any one of those sub-sections to come forward and say: "Our interests are not safeguarded in this particular matter." A perusal of a very interesting series of volumes, Thurston's "Castes and Tribes of Southern India," would show that in that community—that is, the non-Brahmin community—there is a very important section in which there are 153 sub-communities, each one of whom assumes superiority, religious and social, over the other. The result of granting real responsibility and power to members of the non-Brahmin communities, as such, qua the non-Brahmin communities, would mean that the 152nd and 153rd community would say: "We are swamped by the rest." So I would for those reasons strongly advocate that the system of communal electorates should be abandoned. I am at one with those who have pleaded that if a compromise were accepted, and was going to be loyally worked on both sides by providing a maximum for the Brahmin or by a minimum for the non-Brahmin, that might be suggested, but that, as I say, must be as a matter of compromise. With reference to the question of functions, I think I have already stated that the main point which I would insist upon is the question of land revenue. In addition to what has been stated, and if I may say so very cogently stated by the previous witness, I would point out to this Committee that the subject of land revenue is subject entirely to Executive action and Executive rules. That is the reason why we say that Legislative action should have play in the questions of land revenue apart from Executive rules and Executive action. The next point that arises for determination is a question of whether it ought to be a transferred or a reserved subject. On that although in this matter the Report takes a different view, applying the tests suggested by the Report itself for the transfer at page 154 of the Report, we find it stated that opportunities for local knowledge and social service, subjects in which Indians have shown themselves to be keenly interested—these are the tests for the transfer. I make bold to say that those tests if logically applied are such as to include, rather than exclude, land revenue.

Chairman—continued.

So much for the question of franchise and functions. Then, speaking again with reference to the Provincial Councils, I would strongly advocate that the system of the joint purse suggested originally and supported by arguments which are contained in paragraphs 246 and 250 of the Report should be given effect to rather than the separate purse system. All the arguments that have now been advanced with reference to the separate purse system were, if I may say so, present to the minds of the framers of the Report, and have been answered by them. The question of outside arbitrating authority has also been put and answered in the Report, and I would leave it at that, subject to any question that may be asked with reference to that matter. Then I hold that the Bill in so far as it provides that Ministers should hold office during pleasure is a great improvement upon the original scheme as from the very beginning it is made clear that the Ministerial responsibility to the Legislature is defined, but I take it that as a corollary it must follow that the Minister's salary would be on the transferred estimates although it is not clearly laid down in the Bill, but I take it it would be inevitable. I would, therefore, not say more on that subject, but I hold that that is a great improvement on the scheme as originally elaborated, and gives effect to a certain extent to the demand which was really foreseen when a five years' scrutiny was recommended. I grant that the provision there made for the Ministerial responsibility, the Minister holding office during pleasure, obviates the necessity for the five years' scrutiny in one portion, but the other portion remains, and I would advocate that that should remain, and should not go. That is with reference to the further transfer of subjects at the end of the five years. I realise that there are two portions of the examination. The first examination was as to whether the Minister's salary should be placed on the estimates, and the second portion of the examination was as to the further transfer of subjects. I hold that the second requisite has not been satisfied, and that the first requisite is there, and that that demand should be complied with. Another very important point which I would emphasise with regard to the Minister's position is the statement contained in sub-clause 3 of the Bill, namely, that the Minister should be forced to take action. If he takes action then it ought to be made clear that that action is taken on the responsibility of the Governor. It ought not to appear as if the Minister entirely complies with the wish of his constituency or the Legislative Council. It would be a camouflage which I would avoid. If the Governor thinks necessary that the Minister should take a certain kind of action I would advocate what has been stated elsewhere, that the Governor should have the option to dissolve the Council. If after having dissolved the Council he finds that the Legislature again takes the same view he ought to be bound to follow that advice. But assuming that the alternative is not considered advisable, then I would say that action forced on a Minister ought to be such that it ought to be clear to the world that the action is taken on the initiative and at the instance of the Governor. Professor Keith in his Minute points out that in New Zealand the procedure was indicated of the Governor in such cases, in dictating that it was his opinion that it was being followed, and the Minister should, after having said that, continue in office if it should happen that his particular views commanded the acceptance of the Legislative Council. I would also very strongly object to the power of the Government to throttle or block legislation. Provision has been made in the Bill that the Governor may be entitled at any moment—in this instance transcending the powers of the Governor-General himself—to block legislation at any stage. I hold that it will give rise to entirely unnecessary discussion and agitation if adequate and thorough discussion of legislation should be blocked. Then comes the question of the Grand Committees. In dealing with this question I would say that if the Grand Committee is to be constituted on the lines suggested in the latest despatch of the Government of India the Grand Committee has absolutely no reason for existence, because it merely means a useless formality. If the Governor has made up his mind that a particular course is possible there is no necessity for creating a Chamber which is merely bringing into operation his idea, and it seems to me that the only argument which was advanced in regard to this matter, namely, the utility of a full discussion before the Council, would apply equally well when I say that the conditons of the case may be met by the discussion in the Legislative Council and the Governor taking action after such discussion. Why import a second Chamber, especially of the composition suggested by the Government of India, if all that it means is that the Government must have its way. Let the Governor say so and have done with it. In the alternative, if it is felt that a Grand Committee is essential I would say that the only condition of its useful existence is a bare majority, as recommended by many of the witnesses, where there is a possibility of arguments having some efficacy in certain contingencies. In any case I hold that the appeal provided against the certification in paragraph 252 is necessary, or, as suggested by Professor Keith, the approval of the Secretary of State for reference by certification to the Grand Committee. With reference to the Governor's Council, the view which has been expressly put forward is that half the members should be Indian, in order to provide for Indian opinion adequately manifesting itself. This is essential in the government, both of the Provinces and of the Central Government. Without repeating what has already been stated by previous witnesses I would add my voice to theirs in urging very strongly the liberalisation, or, if I may so say, the democratisation of the Central Government. I would leave the particular reasons to any question that may be asked of me. With regard to the Council of State I would say that personally (and I am speaking entirely personally) I am in favour of a double Chamber, in which one Chamber is popular and the other a revising body. If the Council of State can be constituted so as to be an adequate revising chamber, constitute it, otherwise have only the power of ordinance; but if this be not accepted I would very strongly urge that the position be made absolutely clear that if the Council of State should come into existence, it ought not to play any part, excepting in emergency matters and temporarily. So far as the Crewe Committee's Report is concerned, whilst generally agreeing with the recommendations, and especially with the division of functions, if I may so call them, advocated by Sir James Brunyate with reference to what may be called popular and non-popular subjects, and the limits of interference, I would say that the case has been amply made out for the abolition of the Secretary of State's Council, especially in view of the modifications in the other portions of the scheme; but if it is not to be abolished I would be in favour of the suggestions made by Mr. Basu in his minute in the Crewe Committee's Report.

Mr. Bennett.

1535. You refer to University representation, and you express regret at the abolition of that?—Yes.

1536. How will that be regarded in India?—That will be regarded as an attempt by Government by way of crusade against the educated classes.

1537. Would it be regarded as a progressive step, or retrogressive?—The abolition of the University seat would be regarded as a retrograde step.

1538. With regard to the caste difficulty, which you have spoken very fully about, do you think that has been made too much of, or too little of, in this discussion?—It has been made too much of in this country, certainly; in India the agitation is largely artificial.

1539. Have you seen it in the Legislative Council in the province of Madras?—The Legislative Council had, during the whole course of its career, from 1892, introduced, or the members of the Legislative Council have attempted to introduce, various measures tending to the amelioration of all the classes. If you will allow me, I will give you one or two instances. It was a member of the Legislative Council that brought forward the proposal for the abolition of the punishment by stocks. There is an enactment now in force in the Madras Presidency by which the lower castes—it is not an expression invented by the Brahmins, but invented by the Government and embodied in their statute—may be put into stocks. The abolition of that form of punishment was advocated by the Legislative Council, and I think the debates will disclose that the nervousness with reference to its abolition was manifested not on behalf of the elected members, but on behalf of the Government. The reformation of the gaol administration and the improvement in administration of famine relief have been brought forward, and the urgency of educational progress has been pressed forward on behalf of all the classes of the community by members of the Legislative Council, who, according to the discussions now proceeding in England and India, are supposed to represent the intelligentsia.

1540. Have you seen any movements outside the Legislature by which the Brahmins and the educated classes have sought to raise the condition of their poorer countrymen?—I belong myself, if I may say so without egotism, to the governing body of at least three societies for the alleviation of the depressed classes. I am aware, from my own personal knowledge, of a band of estimable young men, mostly Brahmins, who are to-day in Madras going round to the poorest quarters in the city, and the same thing prevails in some of the larger cities in the Madras Presidency, where the problem is acutest—going round to what answer to the slums, and trying to teach the members of the depressed classes the elements of reading and writing. Night classes are held for that purpose by members of the superior castes, and I think I may say, without fear of contradiction, that the highest classes realise to-day, and have for a considerable time been realising, that in the uplifting of the other classes is their own salvation.

1541. You would like to see the Land Revenue included amongst the transferred subjects?—Decidedly.

1542. What opportunity has there been hitherto for influencing the administration of the Land Revenue; what legislative opportunity has there been?—None at all, because the periodical settlements are dealt with on the basis of executive action. I am speaking with reference to the Madras Presidency, with whose conditions I am most familiar naturally. The Board of Revenue and the executive portion of the Government are entirely responsible for the administration of Land Revenue, not only the collection of revenue, but the fixation of the principles upon which that revenue has to be collected, and the Legislature has absolutely no chance of having its will impinged upon the action of the executive.

1543. You have a right of interpellation in regard to these matters, which I think is freely used, not only in Madras, but in other Presidencies?—The right of interpellation may be used in this way. Supposing a settlement takes place, the settlement officer, acting under orders of his superiors, lays down certain principles. Those principles might be attacked, if they are clearly wrong, and you might say that is an increase which is not compatible with the general variation in conditions. To that extent interpellations may go, but the day-by-day administration of the principles of Land Revenue is of the essence of good government in India, and I hope that is just the subject in which the local knowledge of a provincial member might be of the greatest assistance.

1544. You would not interfere, for instance, with a thirty-year settlement; that is not to be interfered with during the term of its currency?—Certainly we would not upset by any revolutionary methods what has already been fixed; but the thirty years settlement does not mean that the settlement does not come on for thirty years more. In certain districts settlements are going on again now. When those settlements come we shall have a chance of finding on what basis the settlement is to proceed, and what is the increase that ought to be contemplated.

1545. Is that a question that can be dealt with in the legislative council? Are not these settlements based on strict local inquiries?—I grant it; but strict local inquiry co-ordinated with what may be called the general policy of the Presidency and of the country.

1546. You object, I see, to blocking legislation by the Government without discussion?—Yes.

1547. Would you elaborate or state more fully the grounds?—What I desire to say is this. If persons have had their say, and if at the end of what they have said arguments on the other side are put forward and a decision is arrived at, it will be much less of a grievance, and there will be much less chance of rankling than if you find that the Legislative Council is told, "You shall not discuss it any longer."

1548. You would say, then, it is to the advantage of the Government that that discussion should take place?—Assuredly.

1549. You are in favour, I think you said, of a Second Chamber as a general principle?—Yes, as a Revising Chamber.

1550. Do you regard either the Grand Committee or the Council of State as coming up to your ideal in any degree of a Second Chamber?—I may say they are contradictory of my ideas.

1551. You recognise the advantage of a legislative body gathering to itself the respect and affection of the people?—Yes.

1552. That is of supreme importance; you admit that?—That is the basis of these reforms.

1553. Can you imagine either the Grand Committee or the Council of State so gaining the respect and affection of the people?—The position is shortly this: So far as the Grand Committee is concerned, it can be supported only on one ground, namely, that after a certain decision in favour of affirmative legislation has been reached, if it is felt that the Government must get through certain measures which are, in the opinion of the Governor, of essential importance, then you have to devise machinery for it. The machinery might be either the independent action of the Governor, subject to such checks as might be devised, or the composition of a Grand Committee. The Grand Committee may be advocated on this basis, namely that if it is such that discussion in it has a chance of influencing it so as to make it possible for the Grand Committee to take the one view or the other, then the Grand Committee may be advocated as a system tending towards the lightening of the very heavy responsibility of the Governor. If, on the other hand, the Grand Committee is so constituted, as is provided in the last despatch of the Government of India, that it is only a registering body, that the decision can only be one way, then there is absolutely no use in constituting it.

1554. Would a Grand Committee reduce the disfavour with which the action of the Government was received?—I am afraid not, as it is sought to be constituted. On the other hand, it will give rise to factious spirit in the Council tending to create two sets of people, one of whom would be termed the favoured of the Government, and the other being the constant opponents. In saying this I am not omitting for a moment the consideration of the fact that the Grand Committee is constituted ad hoc for each Bill.

1555. Is not it of advantage for a legislative body to be constituted ad hoc for a particular purpose?—I would say that for this reason, that is the only chance if the Grand Committee is to be constituted at all of what may be called circulation amongst the members of the Legislative Council, this is an interchange of personnel, otherwise it will be the same set of people doing the same thing over and over again. If it is to be constituted at all it should be constituted ad hoc.

Major Ormsby-Gore.

1556. May I ask you to define for us the exact position of your deputation in relation to the other deputations, such as Mrs. Besant's?—So far as Mrs. Besant's deputation is concerned, I may at once say that the All-India Home Rule League, whose Vice-President I have the honour to be, was the parent body started for the purpose of being an adjunct of the Indian National Congress originally, because it was felt that the Indian National Congress needed some assistance for the purpose of propaganda. Mrs. Besant's organisation, of which she is a delegate, has been, if I may say so, formed ad hoc. So far as the Congress is concerned, I may say that the majority of my body would be generally in favour of the Congress view as to dyarchy. I happen to represent only a minority view, and I have said so in the beginning, and it is because I take it the members of the All-India Home Rule League think on the whole I should be able to do the best I can to serve the interests of the country that they have elected me as a delegate.

1557. I take it then that your personal view, which is, you say, a minority view of your organisation, tends nearer to the position taken up by the National Liberal Federation than does the view taken by the majority of your association?—I think that would be a correct statement.

1558. On actual points, you say that you are in favour personally of the Second Chamber system?—Yes.

1559. Are you in favour of that in the Provinces as well as the Central Government?—The difficulties in the case of the Provinces are for the present well-nigh insuperable. The point is this, that there may not be found in the Provinces, speaking merely as a matter of practical politics, a sufficient number of men who are not wedded to policies which are merely obstructive apart from being deliberative or revising.

1560. In the Central Government you think that such a body could be found. Would you give me briefly your idea as to how such Second Chamber should be constituted?—I may premise whatever I have to say by this, that if the constitution of that Second Chamber is going to involve further delay and further inquiry, as has been suggested by the Government of India, I would rather not have it, because I consider that the sine qua non of all reform is the rapidity with which those reforms are carried into execution.

Chairman.

1561. Is this for the Council of State you are speaking?—Yes, my Lord. I venture to say a direct election by persons of superior qualifications, proprietary and literary, might be devised in course of time which would have all the elements of conservative yet not unprogressive thought which ought to characterise a revising Chamber.

1562. You rule out, do you, thereby a revising Chamber containing a certain number of nominated members; you would like it wholly elected?—In theory, yes.

1563. On the point as to the relation of the Governor to his Legislative Council, are you one of those who take the view that it is very undesirable that the Governor should preside at the Legislative Council?—Yes.

1564. Would you let each Legislative Council select its own Speaker, or would you allow the Governor to nominate?—I would say that one of the conditions of inducing a proper democratic spirit into these Assemblies is to enable the Assemblies to elect their own President.

1565. Would it be possible to obtain a President who has some experience of working of deliberative Assembly by means of election?—If by that question it is meant to ask me whether familiarity with Parliamentary procedure and forms would be readily obtainable, I would say no; but I would leave it to the wisdom of the Legislative Council to choose the best that could be got under the circumstances, holding that study and experience would cure any defects which may initially be found. After all, the whole of the scheme is tentative, and there is no reason why an experiment should not be made in that direction as in any other.

1566. Who do you think would frame the rules of procedure of the Legislative Assembly?—I have endeavoured in my answers to say this, that fundamental rights such as the limit of interpolations and the scope of debate should be defined in the Statute itself—what I may call the fundamental rights of a member. Statutory rules ought to be framed at once. Mere matters of detail of procedure, what I may call the conduct of business of an Assembly, might be left to the Assemblies to work out themselves, according as their experience may suggest.

1567. You would not give the Governor any particular powers in that respect?—No particular powers are needed by the Governor, and I would fancy you would rather leave it to those who have the working of those things to make these rules.

1568. With regard to the Governors in the Provinces other than the three old Presidencies, do you share the view that we heard the other day, that they should be selected from England rather than the Indian Civil Service?—Yes, for this reason, that you are introducing a system which, however sui generis, is modelled on your Parliamentary system, then those who have had the advantage of the working of that system must be the Governors.

1569. Now with regard to certification. At present it is proposed, is it not, in the Bill that the Governor should have power to certify measures for Grand Committee procedure at any stage?—Yes.

1570. Are you one of those who take the view that that should be altered, and that he should only have power to certify after rejection by the Legislative Council?—Yes.

1571. You do not think that that would create more friction—that the mere fact that a Bill has been rejected by the Legislative Council would provoke a political crisis?—The alternative is equally difficult. It means that the Governor makes up his mind as soon as a Bill is introduced that the Legislature is likely to reject it.

1572. That would be the interpretation generally to be put upon the action of the Governor?—Yes.

1573. One question with regard to the Council of India here. Do you think that, during the first interim period whilst this great constitutional change is taking place in India, it is very important that the Secretary of State should have in the India Office both Englishmen and Indians of recent political experience whom he can consult from day to day?—In my answers I have stated that for the purpose of working this experiment for five years or ten years the Secretary of State might feel handicapped without a Council. In that case, if the expedient suggested by Mr. Basu in his Minute, namely, that the Secretary of State's Council is composed of half the number of Indians and is further recruited by men trained in the Parliamentary tradition, were adopted, it would enable the Secretary of State on the one hand to get local knowledge, and on the other hand to familiarise the whole country with the Parliamentary traditions, and bring in Parliamentary experience; and for that purpose, subject to the qualification contemplated by Sir James Brunyate, namely, that the Council of India should automatically terminate at the end of ten years, unless Parliament for paramount reasons extends its functions, I should be in favour of a temporary Council, as indicated.

1574. You would not give up any of the present statutory powers for finance that the existing Council has?—There are two aspects of that matter to be considered. The argument, I take it, for the continuance of the Secretary of State's Council is that he wants special experience. Therefore, subject to what I have outlined, I would say let that continue; but the financial veto, as I understand it, being a mere outsider, operates harshly, and I would, therefore, be in favour of the abolition of the financial veto.

1575. You take the view that the financial veto has led to an enormous number of administrative actions on the part of the administrative Government coming to Whitehall which need never have come to Whitehall?—Yes; but at the same time it must not be forgotten that to abolish the financial veto, while preserving the present constitution of the Council, would induce in the people of India the conviction that the Council of the Secretary of State might sacrifice Indian to British interests.

1576. Even though it were composed of half each?—That is why I subjected my remarks to the qualification, unless it were reconstituted.

Lord Islington.

1577. You said you would like to see revenue, industries, and education as three subjects to be controlled by Ministers?—Yes.

1578. What do you mean by industries?—Development of business concerns and legislation. I include co-operation and the law relating to business concerns; not company law generally, which I would make an all-India subject.

1579. In the promotion of industries you would include that within a Province?—Yes.

1580. And all the financial arrangements that surround that promotion?—Yes, certainly. I feel in all this discussion it is understood that I accept the view that the Government would deliberate as a whole, and that whilst a Minister would have the expert assistance and guidance of the Executive Council and the Governor, he would be entitled to lay down the general policy.

1581. Have you read the Report of the Commission on Industries?—Yes, very carefully.

1582. Do you agree with the general recommendations of that Report?—I must say that I take an objection in limine to that Report on the ground that the Terms of Reference were unduly restricted, but subject to that I generally approve of the directions of progress suggested in the Commission's Report.

Mr. SPOOR.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE EARL OF SELBORNE IN THE CHAIR.

The Hon. MR. C. P. RAMASWAMI AIYAR is recalled; and further Examined, as follows:—

Witness.] Before Lord Sinha begins I should like, if I may, to amplify one or two points which I referred to yesterday in my preliminary statement, because that might obviate some questions. The first of the points I desire to press upon the attention of the Committee is with reference to the question of the right of the Legislative Assembly to regulate the fiscal policy. That I had not adverted to yesterday in my preliminary observations, and I would press that very strongly on the attention of the Committee as being a unanimous demand on the part, practically, of the Indian deputations. Closely connected with that, and dealt with more or less as a part of the whole problem, is the question of the liberalisation of the Government of India itself. The problem of fiscal autonomy, of fiscal freedom, is sought to be solved by the majority of the Lord Crewe Committee in one of two ways. Professor Keith suggests that the problem may be faced boldly and frankly straight away; but the alternative is suggested with reference to the Secretary of State not interfering where the Legislative Council and the Government are at one. Whether it is achieved in one way or the other, my humble submission before this Committee would be that it is far better to face the problem straight away at once. That matter has to be dealt with.

The second point, which arises out of an answer I gave to a question addressed to me by Major Ormsby-Gore, is with reference to the question of diarchy. That system is accepted only as a transitional stage and subject to the unified Budget and to the transfer of taxation which are features of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, and not features of the Govenment of India resolutions. It would be unworkable, in my view, unless the unified Budget and the common deliberation are not preserved as integral portions of this scheme. Another branch of this question of diarchy which I would take leave to urge is this: I hold the views of the Indian National Congress which met at Bombay, and which in substance takes the same line except on this one question with the Indian National Congress which met at Delhi.

The next point which I would also urge very strongly is the question of Provincial contributions. I had omitted to mention anything about it yesterday. I would very strongly urge that the question of the Provincial contributions should be dealt with in the statute itself, not, of course, making each Province contribute so much—that is not a possible subject for statutory enactment—but laying down the principles either in the statute itself, or at all events, by statutory rules, that the Provincial contributions ought to be in proportion either to the revenue or on some equitable basis of that kind, and not leave it to be fixed arbitrarily without any definite tests. Those are the points I wanted to submit to your Committee, and especially that about myself and the League which I have the honour to represent being at one with the resolutions of the Congress, excepting that one question of the diarchy.

Lord Sinha

1583. Before I ask you any questions, might I draw your attention to the record of your evidence yesterday?—I have not got it.

1584. It is on page 83. I think there is a mistake in the record. That is why I want to draw your attention to it. This is the record of what you said with regard to the Council of State: "With regard to the Council of State, I would say that personally (and I am speaking entirely personally) I am in favour of a double chamber, in which one chamber is popular and the other a registering body"?—Oh, no; it is quite the opposite, I am afraid. "Revising" was the word, I believe, I used.

1585. Would you mind looking at clause 3 of the Bill. With regard to the second sentence in clause 1 about the salary of the Minister, would you object to the clause remaining as it is, provided the salary was placed upon the transferred estimates?—I would, for this reason. Whilst holding that the transfer of the salary to the transferred estimates would complete the ministerial responsibility that is contemplated, yet I would urge that the same clause in the Bill, one of the sub-clauses of Clause 3, should make it clear that such salary should be the same as that of the members of the Executive Council, and I would say that the words might make it clear that the salary of the members and the Ministers need not be the same in all the Provinces—that is, the salary of the Executive Council members and the Minister in Bombay may or may not be the same as the similar salaries in Assam. But, nevertheless, in the same Province, the status, position and salary of the Executive Council and the Minister should be entirely alike.

1586. There is one further question I want to ask you on that. There may, of course, be more Ministers than one in any particular Province?—Yes.

1587. Would your answer be the same with regard to each Minister, that the position of each Minister should be the same with regard to pay and status as that of an Executive Councillor?—Yes, the reason being being that at the inauguration of the experiment, I took it, the Ministers would be pooled only if there is work enough for, say, three Ministers in addition to the one already contemplated, or two or whatever it may be. There ought not to be a difference between them inter se.

1588. One other question with regard to Ministers. You notice the same clause, Sub-Clause 3, "In relation to a transferred subject, the Governor shall be guided by the advice of the Minister in charge, unless, having regard," etc. Does that to your mind contemplate that the Governor should have relations with each Minister independently of others when there is more than one?—If I may say so, the wording of the clause seems to suggest the isolation of each Minister in relation to the Governor.

1589. Do you favour that?—I would not. I would keep ministerial responsibility corporate, as the responsibility of the Executive Council is corporate.

Chairman.

1590. I should like to pursue that a little. If one member of the Executive Council differs from another, he does not resign?—No.

1591. In case, we will say, of two Ministers only, and each with their own department and responsibility, would you say that the Minister whose department is not in question should resign if he does not approve of the policy of his colleagues?—I shall endeavour to answer the question. It may be thought at first that if the Minister is to be responsible to the Legislative Council each Minister ought to stand on his own legs, so to say, but it seems to me that, having regard to the tentative nature of the experiment, and in the transitional stage, it is as well that the Governor should act in conjunction with two Ministers—if there are two—taking their conjoint advice; and if a question arises as between one Minister and another on account of differences of opinion, the same attempt should be made as between the Executive Council on the one side and the Ministers on the other, that there ought to be an attempt, as I say, some kind of mediation or arbitration, and a modus vivendi agreed to.

Lord Sinha.

1592. The corporate responsibility that you suggest would be the only means for the development of a Cabinet system of government, would it not?—Yes. If I may say so respectfully that is what I had in my mind.

1593. And any other scheme would mean friction? First of all we will take it in the way of allocation of funds?—Yes.

1594. And if you keep each Minister separate or isolated from the other you would not only have a dual Government, but a triple or quadruple Government?—As many Governments as there are individuals.

1595. And I suppose you would regard that as unworkable?—And likely to embarrass still further the Governor in relation to his advisers.

1596. Now there is one matter in relation to Ministers arising out of your written Memorandum which I want to elucidate. You say, I think, that the Minister should have the position of leader of the House?—I suggest that having regard to his position he ought to be the exponent of the Government policy.

1597. Will you look at your answer to question 7, which is Sub-clause 4 of your answers?—Yes. "The Minister, in virtue of his position, must be the virtual leader of the House and the exponent of Government policy."

1598. I want you to elucidate that, because, speaking for myself, it is not quite clear to me. First of all, apart from the position of leader, you would say that he should be the exponent of Government policy? I take it that that would be with reference to the policy of the transferred department?—I should go a little further than this. I take it at all events the advocacy of most of the members of the deputation is in favour of Provincial taxation being a transferred subject, so that the Minister or Ministers, as the case may be, would be in charge of taxation proposals as a whole, either arising out of the needs of the transferred subjects, or arising out of the needs of the Government as a whole, in relation to the needs of the transferred as well as the reserved branches. As the exponent of the policy regarding taxation, he would naturally have to expound the Government policy as a whole, because, I take it, taxation is of the essence of Governmental administration, and it was with reference to that that I was asking that the Minister should be placed in charge of the exposition of the Government policy, and therefore be the leader of the House.

1599. The policy generally, or policy when it leads to taxation?—Policy when it leads to taxation.

1600. Of course if taxation is a transferred subject?—Yes, I act entirely on that basis.

1601. On the other hand, if each side of the Government has power of asking for taxation for its own needs that would not apply?—No.

Chairman.

1602. Where there is more than one Minister, who is to choose the leader of the House?—The Ministers inter se. This will approximate to the Cabinet system, in which, so long as the Prime Minister as such is not in existence under this scheme, I take the Ministers in consultation with each other will arrive at a decision as to who is to lead the House.

1603. Subject to the advice of the Governor?—Certainly.

1604. The Governor will choose both Ministers when there are two or all the Ministers when there are more than two?—Yes.

1605. And I take it they will decide, according to your view, between themselves, with the advice of the Governor, as to who is to be the exponent of the policy so far as their side is concerned?—Yes, and in fact it has to be done in that manner, because if taxation is to be a transferred subject, one of the two Ministers in charge of the transferred subjects will have to take charge of the taxation proposals.

1606. And even if taxation were not a transferred subject, with regard to their own departments, the transferred departments, the general policy might be expounded by one of them as such?—Very probably, yes.

1607. Will you look at Clause 9? The controversial matter arises really on Clause 9?—Yes.

1608. Before going into the budget, which is the first part, may I draw your attention to the clauses about Grand Committees, Sub-clauses (3), (4) and (5). I take it that, in your view, if the Grand Committee procedure is accepted, you would insist on there being discussion in the Legislative Council before a Bill is referred to a Grand Committee?—Yes.

1609. So as to elicit fully public opinion?—Yes.

1610. In that view the words in the second sentence of Sub-clause 4 and in the first sentence of Sub-clause 5, "is proposed to be introduced," are particularly objectionable, because that means no discussion?—No reference to the Provincial Council at all.

1611. If those words are eliminated it would meet your objection to a great extent?—Yes.

1612. Wholly?—No, because I would, if I may say so, insist on two references to the Legislative Assembly, in this way. There is no object in referring to a Grand Committee directly without reference to the Legislative Assembly, because it deprives the Government and the Legislative Assembly itself of seeing the pros and cons of the position. After the discussion, and when public opinion has been ascertained on the matter—if a Grand Committee is decided upon; I am only arguing on that basis because my first position is that a Grand Committee as sought to be constituted, is unnecessary and would be injurious, but if it is to be constituted—the prior discussion would be of great avail. And then, if it passes through the Grand Committee, it seems to me that any amendments or alterations that have been made in the Grand Committee should be again reported to the Legislative Council in order that the Legislative Council might make up its mind again with reference to what has passed in the Grand Committee on the matter, and that finally the Governor should take the responsibility.

1613. Would there be any great use in the second reference?—The first reference is of the essence of the programme; the second reference I would not consider as essential as the first.

1614. So far as information is concerned, the Legislative Council would have it in any case?—Yes.

1615. I think you have stated that the Council of State in the Central Legislature you do not accept in the form suggested either in the Report or by the Government of India?—No.

1616. And if any procedure of that kind is to be retained, you would prefer the Grand Committees?—Yes.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

1617. You gave an opinion with regard to the Grand Committee, from which I gather that you do not favour the establishment of a Grand Committee at all. Is that so?—Yes.

1618. You think that in any case in which the Governor has to interpose it would be better that he interposed, so to speak, by his own fiat rather than by any other machinery?—Yes.

1619. I notice that you regard many questions with regard to this as experimental. You would feel that there was a necessity that there should be a check somewhere in the early stages of these Councils?—I would consider so.

1620. And if there is to be a check you would rather it came from the Governor than otherwise?—My reasons, if I may be permitted to say so, would be these, that after all the resort to a Grand Committee would be regarded as a pure formality, and if there is going to be the elimination of blame falling upon the Governor that expedient will not solve the question, because they would in any event say that the Government have decided upon the policy and they are carrying through the Bill by means of this process of the Grand Committee.

1621. With regard to the Cabinet, you would favour the Council and the Ministers sitting together?—Yes.

1622. Would you regard the Governor in the light of an umpire or of a party? How would you wish him to be regarded?—The position of the Governor in the transitional period is, of necessity, very difficult exactly to define, but I would rather that the Governor were regarded in the capacity of mediator than anything else—mediator with this difference, that mediators have not generally got to carry out the result of their mediation, but the Governor would have to.

1623. What do you feel as regards the Governor himself being Speaker or Chairman of the Legislative Council?—I would deprecate the Governor being chairman of the Legislative Council in the interests of the Governor himself, because I take it that the position of mediation and impartiality which is his prerogative in relation to the Executive Council and the Ministers would make it all the more necessary that the heat and stress of the Legislative Assembly should not be deflected on him.

1624. In your experience of Indian Assemblies, which I believe is large, do you find the position of chairman or president has been a difficult one?—I take it it is difficult in one sense in every country, and India is no exception.

1625. You recognise that at the Legislative Council there would be great technicalities of Parliamentary procedure which are at present not understood?—Yes.

1626. Under those circumstances, do you think that it is really desirable at the outset that these new Councils should choose their own President?—I regard it as very essential that they should. If I may elaborate it, I take it the idea is that persons ought to be trained from the Legislative Councils themselves in the arts of parliamentary debate. If that training is necessary it ought to be imparted both from the point of view of the private member and of the Speaker. How is that training going to be developed unless, even at the risk of mistakes, which are not irremediable, someone is given the position of Speaker, having an amount of detachment, and is taught to exercise the virtues of that detachment, which, I take it, are the functions of the Speaker.

Marquess of Crewe.

1627. With regard to the position of the Governor, I did not quite understand one of your replies to Lord Midleton, or, in fact, one of Lord Midleton's questions, because I understood from your former examination that your view was that the Governor should not, either ex proprio motu, or through some such body as the Council of State, have the power of checking legislation at an early stage. Was that so?—There are two questions involved in this. I was speaking yesterday on the power conferred by this Bill of what may be called blocking legislation. It was that I objected to, because I stated that the Governor's responsibility would be intolerable if he took upon himself to block legislation, and thereby to incur the odium of public condemnation even before the members had an opportunity of expressing their views on the subject.

1628. Your desire was that if he felt compelled to interfere he should only do so after a full discussion in the Legislative Assembly, after the whole matter had been thrashed out, and that if he then thought it necessary to interfere he would put his foot down, so to speak?—He would resort to any of the expedients which can be devised for the purpose of dealing with affirmative legislation.

1629. That would mean the simple use of the power of veto without a preliminary checking power?—Yes.

1630. Do you think that the limitation of the Governor's power in that respect would prove to be inconvenient to him and make his position difficult?—As contrasted with other procedure I should not think so, for the reason that the Governor would have the advantage of eliciting popular opinion. It might in many cases meet him half way, or he might meet popular opinion half way, because final action would depend upon the extent to which he is constrained to differ from the result of popular discussion.

1631. And you think, therefore, that if he had to incur odium it would be less if he felt in the last resort obliged to veto rather than if, in the first instance, he forbade the discussion of the proposed legislation altogether?—Yes.

1632. Now I am quite clear on that point. There is one point in regard to the home side. As a general proposition you are in favour of abolishing the Secretary of State's Council?—Yes.

1633. But if, as many people think, it would be impossible to do that as a single operation by the present Bill, of the two you would prefer Sir James Brunyate's scheme, which involves retaining the Council with definitely limited powers, to the creation of a new body of Advisory Councils, as the majority of my Committee proposed?—Yes, with the reservation suggested by Sir James Brunyate that that body would automatically come to an end at the end of 10 or 12 years unless a Parliamentary Commission reported that it is necessary to take any other course.

1634. I quite agree that is an important feature in the scheme, but you would differ from Sir James Brunyate in that you would increase the number of Indian members of the Council to a statutory half of the entire body?—Yes; I regard it as essential to the success of the scheme, especially in view of the discussion which has been summarised in the Report of your Lordship's Committee.

1635. Will you tell what in your view precisely is the advantage from the Indian point of view of having a large number of Indian gentlemen on the Secretary of State's Council at this end? I will explain why I ask the question. The view of some of us has been that the further representation of India, which we all desire to promote, ought to be in India itself rather than here; that as advance is made in the direction of a Dominion status it is preferable for India to take its larger share, so to speak, at home rather than here, and that from one point of view it may almost be regarded as a retrograde step to increase Indian representation here. I should like to know you opinion on that?—On that point I agree, if I may say so, that the largest scope that may be afforded to Indian talent in India would make it perhaps more difficult and perhaps also unnecessary that there should be a large number of prominent Indian gentlemen here doing this particular kind of work. That is to me a very cogent argument for the abolition of the Council of the Secretary of State. I would use it in order to enforce that position of mine. If, however, it is decided that the Council of the Secretary of State should not be abolished, then I say that in addition to the official experience which he gets from the permanent heads of Departments and the recruitment of the Civil Service, there ought to be Indian experience made available for such a time as the Council may have decided upon.

1636. You would regard the Indian element in the Council as something of a check to be exercised in advising the Secretary of State upon the purely official view which otherwise he might alone receive?—Yes.

Sir J. D. Rees.] Lord Selborne, may I ask the witness a question in a form designed to economise time?

Chairman.] Thank you.

Sir J. D. Rees.

1637. Did you hear the evidence given by Mr. Surendranath Banerjea and Mrs. Besant?—Yes.

1638. Did you follow it?—Oh, yes.

1639. Having regard to the relevance of the existence or non-existence of an upper and lower caste question, to the length of its existence if it exists, or to the date of its commencement if recent, and to the significance of the Nair prominence therein at present, and to its bearing upon communal representation in the attitude of the Government of Madras, have you anything you wish to add to what has been said upon that question?—In answer to that very comprehensive question, I may mention that I am a native of the Madras Presidency——

1640. So am I, almost?—And I have had special experience of various portions of the Madras Presidency in which this manifestation of the non-Brahmin problem is most acute. For instance, I have known a number of persons in Malabar, and have presided over the Malabar District Conference which was organised by a number of very prominent non-Brahmin gentlemen in Malabar. I have also watched the inception and development of the non-Brahmin problem in the town of Madras, where I practice my profession, and I may say that it would be quite accurate to state, as the Honourable Mr. Banerjea did state, that the present aspect of the non-Brahmin problem dates only from the promulgation of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report. It is not for me to deny that for some considerable time there had been a feeling amongst the non-Brahmin communities that they, not having taken advantage of the educational facilities as the Brahmin communities did, were at a disadvantage in so far as the recruitment of services and so forth was concerned; but they regarded it, as I take it, only as a spur and an incentive to progress, and efforts were made by non-Brahmin leaders, in order to spur them on to progress, instancing the relative progress of the Brahmin community. But there was no bitterness involved in the controversy, and no question of the elimination of the Brahmin element to any extent, or the segregation of the Brahmin element. That has been a new feature. In the next place, it would be quite accurate to state, as the Honourable Mr. Banerjea did state, and Mrs. Besant corroborated, that there has been no sense of exclusiveness manifested by any one community towards any other. In the public life of the Madras Presidency non-Brahmin leaders have played a very great part. The late Mr. Ramaswami Mudaliar was an acknowledged leader of society. He was a very learned and cultured gentleman. Other names, such as those of Sir Sankaran Nair himself, and Kesava Pillai, might also be added. In addition to that, it will also be apparent that before the acuter phases of the problem came into prominence after the promulgation of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, in contested elections very often Brahmins supported non-Brahmins and vice versa. I might at once give an instance in point. At the last election to the Madras Legislative Council I was a member of the Corporation of Madras. I, a Brahmin, supported the candidate who was one of the chief lieutenants of Dr. Nair, and voted for him; and two other Brahmin gentlemen, who also served on the Corporation of Madras, voted for him. The main objection to him arose from Dr. Nair, who was then his determined opponent, and the reason for the return of the

Brahmin candidate, whom Dr. Nair put up, was because of the non-Brahmin votes cast against the non-Brahmin. The result, therefore, of the discussion is this: The non-Brahmin leader, Dr. Nair, supported a Brahmin to the Legislative Council and obtained the support of non-Brahmins to vote for the Brahmin. A number of Brahmin members—I think all the Brahmin members of the Corporation excepting one—voted for the non-Brahmin candidate. That is a crucial instance in point, and it may also be stated that prior to the last elections in which exceptional causes supervened, non-Brahmins were frequently returned to the Legislative Council by all constituencies. Dr. Nair himself was returned to the Corporation of Madras by an essentially Brahmin constituency which largely consists of Brahmin graduates. They returned him to the Corporation of Madras. I may say that very much has been made of the last election. It is said, and I think Sir Alexander Cardew's minute makes some point of it, that nine out of ten seats are held by Brahmins in the Madras Legislative Council. That argument overlooks the fact that four out of the nine elections were uncontested, and so far as another election was concerned, the contest was between a Brahmin and a European. I would therefore say unhesitatingly that this problem has been given much more artificial importance than it deserves.

1641. You heard Mr. Surendranath Banerjea say that he, as a reformer, and his friends, contemplated the ultimate—I do not know what he meant by that exactly—the ultimate extinction of caste. I would ask whether the present reform movement in India, and the present reformers are as they were in the days of the Early Brahmin Samaj, and so on, anti-caste, or whether this is essentially little more than an orthodox movement?—The answer would necessarily be lengthy, but I would like to condense my remarks. The political reform movement may be described as transcending castes, not as involving or postulating the abolition of caste, but transcending caste in this sense. We recognise that the caste system still exists and will probably exist for some time, and there are parties amongst us who want the abolition as a social factor, others, not; but all would agree, orthodox or unorthodox, that the political problems can best be solved only by that spirit of brotherhood which we say is also an element of the caste system, but not an element of certain of the later developments of the caste system.

1642. You know the Moplas and the Lubbas of Southern India?—Very well.

1643. They are by descent converted Hindoos?—Yes.

1644. Are they in their lives and conversation more Hindoo than Mohammedan?—They are entirely Hindoo.

1645. Has that an important bearing on the question of communal representation?—So far as the Madras Presidency is concerned I believe they go through tali, which is a Hindoo marriage rite, in addition to going through the Mohammedan rites. There is no great cleavage between the Hindoos and the Mohammedans in that community.

1646. Does the age-long caste quarrel of the right and the left hand still exist?—Oh, no.

1647. It has quite gone?—Quite gone. The division of the right and left would have quite gone long ago but for the fact that the Madras Government divided the town of Madras into two divisions on the footing of the right and left factions.

1648. Sir Alexander Cardew in his note refers, not as of his own knowledge, but quoting the "Imperial Gazeteer," to the pollution distance of 64 ft. for a pariah. Do you know any part of the British territory in the Madras Presidency in which these pollution distances are observed?—Well, I think it would be correct to say that attempts have been made to enforce those pollution distances, not by the Brahmin community, but by the higher non-Brahmin community. Cases have arisen in the Law Courts recently in which a Brahmin has attempted to bring a person within the polluting distance in order to test the validity and the ultimate legal sanction of such rules.

1649. Has there been a rapid democratic advance in the Madras Presidency during the last five years and the five years preceding the war?—Most perceptible.

1650. Would you say that the development had an altogether characteristically eastern character, or has it partaken very much of a western character?—I would say it has partaken of the general democratic impulse which is observable in the world, and which has, very largely, Western origin.

1651. You were asked a question with regard to conditions in native States. I will ask you one question, with Lord Selborne's permission, regarding the only three in which I have myself served. Taking the States of Mysore, Travancore, and Cochin, are there not bodies of a Parliamentary nature—let me say representative bodies—which really largely colour the administration? Can you say there is anything autocratic in the Governments of those States now?—In legal theory, each of those Governments is autocratic; but in practice, even before the introduction of the Legislative Councils, the Rajahs of those three native States were naturally subject to what may be called the popular opinion, reflected through his Indian Councillors; but more recently an attempt has been made—and is being successfully inaugurated— of popular assemblies, where all questions of public importance are discussed.

1652. And they do leaven public opinion, I presume?—Yes.

1654. Because in that case the initiative for taxation to meet the needs of the transferred subjects would not rest with the Minister. Is that so?—I would say so; yes.

1655. As regards the India Office, you said you were in favour of the abolishing of the Indian Council. Whether that Council be abolished, or whether it be supplanted by an Advisory Committee, do you think it is a good thing to provide that members of Parliament should not be on it?—No; on the other hand, having the ultimate objects in view, namely, the introduction of democratic institutions into the country, it would be advisable to have, as expert advisers of the Secretary of State, not only persons conversant with Indian conditions, but also with Parliamentary procedure.

1656. Is the opinion held, so far as you know, that British Parliamentary experience is very good for men and Civil Servants and future Governors? Is not that view strongly held?—Very strongly.

1657. As regards the present Legislative Councils, you were asked whether they had the respect and affection of the people?—I am afraid I do not know.

1658. If they have—I do not understand that you deny it, at any rate—why should a Grand Committee (which is formed out of that Council), and a Council of State (which is to be formed in the same manner), not possess equally the respect and affection of the people?—They might, under very altered circumtsances; but if they are formed—as has been suggested—merely with the object, and so as to preserve the appearance, of being registered bodies of the will of the Government, they will not possess their respect and affection.

1659. You heard the evidence of Mrs. Besant. Do you think that the ancient Guilds which exist in India which still subsist have any correspondence with trades unions in England, or have the same influence upon labour questions?—I am afraid not.

1660. As regards the Governor in Council constitution, you have some experience of that, having been on the Governor's Legislative Council: Have you been struck with the extent to which the Government of India really controls the administration of the Provinces which you know, or not?—Yes; it has been a frequent cause of complaint by the Madras Government. I have not been in the Council very long, but I have studied the history of the Madras administration sufficiently intimately to know.

1661. Is it an effective continual close check and interference?—Largely, it is felt that the Government of most Presidencies is the Government of India, excepting in a very few and limited matters.

1662. Is it the case that the Government of India is co-Governor with the Government of Madras? Do you feel it to be a great factor in the actual government?—Not having been within the Executive Government, I cannot say.

1663. Then I leave that. Can you say what is the attitude of the people of Madras, the educated people or the uneducated people, or both, as regards the reform question, and could you say how far they are in accord with the attitude which the Government of Madras has adopted with regard to this reform question generally?—I am glad that that question has been put to me, because I think I can say something pertinent on the subject. It is generally regarded that the Government of Madras has adopted an attitude of indifference, if not of hostility, towards the whole question. I may at once say that general educated opinion, not only Brahmin or the intelligentsia opinion, but the general opinion throughout the Madras Presidency, is in favour of reforms tending to make democracy possible. The Madras Government has apparently taken the view that such an experiment is fraught with great danger, and the view has been very trenchantly put by Sir Alexander Cardew, who stated that so long as the Indian people believed in the transmigration of souls, so long would democracy be impossible; I am probably putting it in an extreme form, but that is the net result of his Minute. That is not an opinion in which the people of Madras share. As giving a further example, I would say that various resolutions of the non-Brahmin conferences which have been held after the controversy took an acute form, make it abundantly clear that they too want power and a transference of power —segregation of power if you like, but a transference all the same—showing that the Madras Government's view as adumbrated by Sir Alexander Cardew is not felt as the final solution of the problem.

Mr. Spoor.

1664. You are really a University representative, and I would like to ask you one or two questions regarding education and as to its being affected by this Bill. First of all, I would like to ask you regarding the peasant position. We hear of the enormous percentage of illiterates in India. Can you give us any idea how many people in India—what percentage, have an opportunity of education at all in any shape or form?—I may say this, that the present figures—I am speaking subject to correction—are, that of men, 106 out of 1,000 are literate, and amongst the women only about 12 or 13 out of 1,000 are literate. The total proportion, striking an average, is about 50 per 1,000 throughout the whole country. Now that state of things is produced, according to most persons who have given any attention to the subject, by the circumstance in the first place that there are not enough schools to which people can go. In the second place, it is felt in that country, as it has been felt in every country as a matter of history, that unless at the initial stage some element of compulsion is resorted to, you cannot introduce a system of education which will permeate the whole country. Taking those two factors into account, it must be stated that the facilities for improving the spread of education are extremely limited.

1665. Is there any feeling in India that education has been starved in past years?—Yes.

Chairman.] We are not inquiring into the Government of India.

Mr. Spoor.

1666. I am asking this question with a view of ascertaining the possible effect of this Bill so far as education is concerned. (To the Witness.) With regard to the future, do you believe that the passage of this Bill will lead to any material improvement?—I would not give an answer to that question. I would say if the passing of the Bill means that the Bill is passed exactly as it is at present drafted, with the possibility of the rules being also drafted so as to suit the Government of India's ideas, my answer would be no.

1667. You feel, apparently, that with the prospective revenue which you will have it will be impossible to make any real progress?—Yes, and with the taxation proposals of the Government of India.

1668. You agree, I suppose, that the real need in India, as probably of other countries at this moment, is education?—Yes.

1669. That it will improve the material conditions of the people?—That has been the universal experience, and there is no reason why it should be different in India.

1670. You agree also that it will go a long way towards the extinction of caste?—As a disintegrating factor.

1671. You think that what educational work is done should go more along Eastern lines—that is, there should be no attempt to impose our stereotype Western methods?—I would not restrict it by saying Eastern means or Western means. I would say we must evolve our own system of education.

1672. I have a question which was suggested by the question of my honourable friend Sir John Rees with regard to any correspondence between the ancient guilds in India and modern trade unions, but I gathered from Mrs. Besant's answers yesterday that whilst these ancient guilds did furnish some parallel, as a matter of fact there have been established during quite recent months unions which correspond with the unions existing in Europe?—And frankly modelled on them.

1673. You believe that they would continue to develop?—It depends on the way they are developed.

Lord Sydenham.

1674. I believe you represent the All India Home Rule League?—Yes.

1675. Are you also a member of the National Congress?—Yes, I was. I was Secretary of the Bombay Congress.

1676. You are still a member of the Congress?—Yes.

1677. In a paper which has been handed to us by the Secretary of the National Congress it is pointed out that that body has existed for 33 years, and it has during that time consistently followed its object. Its object is the attaining of self-government within the Empire on the lines of that now enjoyed by the self-governing dominions. Has the Home Rule League any different object from that?—No.

1678. Then what was the need of a fresh organisation if the National Congress was pressing forward the same object on constitutional lines?—I may at once give you the answer. The Home Rule League does not purport to be an opposition body to the National Congress at all. Propaganda was considered necessary in order to spread political ideas throughout the country, and for the purpose of the propaganda it was felt that a body which moved perhaps quicker, and which was not confined to what may be called annual sessions but would do the work throughout the country day in and day out, would be an essential adjunct of the activities of the Congress, which was the raison d'être of the Home Rule League.

1680. I think the Home Rule League was started in September, 1916?—Yes.

1681. Before that time had the Viceroy begged that controversial matters should be laid aside during the war?—Yes. Do you want me to answer the question in detail? The answer is yes, but it was felt that the Viceroy had disregarded his own advice.

1682. Can you say why it was decided at a moment when the Empire was fighting for its life and the issue was most uncertain that this fresh propaganda should be started throughout India?—For the purpose, as we honestly thought, of strengthening the hands of the Empire and India's connection with the Empire.

1683. Your contribution to the war was a movement of propaganda for home rule?—Certainly not. Speaking personally, I have done a great deal of war work. I offered to enlist myself, but my offer was not accepted. The same thing can be said of most of the prominent members of my League.

1684. You have said that this propaganda was directed to strengthening the hands of the Empire during the war?—Not only by agitation, but the members of the League in their various capacities took a great deal of part in war work. I have been a member of a number of organisations connected with war work.

1685. A very distinguished Mohammedan wrote to me complaining bitterly of the harm which had been done to students by bringing them into the Home Rule movement. Was that done?—It is an absolute untruth, for the reason that one of the rules prohibits students having anything to do with the work of the Home Rule League.

1686. No sort of propaganda was carried on among students?—There were classes held in which students were taught politics. Those classes had nothing to do with the Home Rule League as such, but existed long before the Home Rule League came into existence. It would be false to say that the students were diverted into active politics by this League or any other organisation.

1687. Then I was wrongly informed?—I am afraid so.

1688. Not long after the agitation of the boycott movement in Bengal Sir Surendra Nath Banerjea wrote these words: "In all great movements boys and young men play a prominent part. The Divine message first comes to them, and they are persecuted, and they suffer for their faith. 'Suffer little children to come unto Me' are the words of the divinely inspired Founder of the Christian religion, and the faith that is inseparable from childhood is the faith which has built up great creeds and has diffused them through the world." Do you hold that doctrine?—I can answer that in this way. I hold the view that in India and every other country it is the young we touch with the spirit, but if more than that is meant by it—and I am sure the Honourable Mr. Banerjea would not mean that—if an implication is sought to be made, I ought to have notice of what is thought to be merged in those words.

1689. You entirely disapprove of using students for the purpose of political agitation?—Certainly; and, if I may say so, most persons who have thought about Indian politics do disapprove of students taking an active part in politics, though they must be instructed in politics.

1690. The orginal Home Rule League has recently been divided, has it not?—Yes.

1691. What are the differences between the two branches?—Does your Lordship want me to answer that question?

Chairman.] What exactly is the point, Lord Sydenham?

Lord Sydenham.] We now have a representative of one branch of the Home Rule League which has quite recently been split into two. I wanted to know what those two branches separately mean, or if they have really the same objects.

Chairman.] Mrs. Besant gave her account yesterday.

Lord Sydenham.] Then I will gladly withdraw that question.

Witness.] I do not entirely concur in the account which Mrs. Besant has given, but I consider that the work of this Committee does not involve an examination of the differences between the two Leagues.

Chairman.] If the witness does not agree with what Mrs. Besant said yesterday, I think you have a right to press your question.

Lord Sydenham.

1692. Will you explain the differences?—Mrs. Besant said yesterday it was because persons hated her on account of her participation in the Gandhi movement that the other League was formed. I do not think that was the psychology; it was really on account of a difference of opinion which rose with regard to the working of the Rowlatt Act.

1693. And the difference between the two branches is solely a difference of view upon the Rowlatt Act?—In the main I would say yes.

1694. The National Congress was split in 1907?—Yes, I was present at Surat myself, where the Congress took place which produced this so-called split.

1695. A split which at the time went so far as blows, did it not?—Yes.

1696. Was the Congress re-united during the war?—Yes.

1697. Is it fair to say that it has been again divided in the later months?—I do not think so. There have been differences of opinion in regard to this particular measure measure which is now on the tapis, but I would still hold that every political thinker in India holds himself in allegiance to the Congress.

1698. We may regard the Congress as one solid body speaking with one voice?—Not on this particular Bill, because opinions have differed on this Bill, and those opinions have differed with reference to what may be called compromise matters and what may be called questions of immediate practicability and so forth, not on any fundamental difference in the political programme in India.

1699. I think you spoke of the disappearance of caste, and I hope we shall get some more evidence on that point. Is it the fact that the Inter-caste Marriages Bill has aroused rather strong resentment amongst orthodox Hindoos who form the majority of Hindoos?—It has aroused opposition, there is no doubt.

1700. It aroused rather bitter opposition among the Hindoos?—I am afraid it was a somewhat artificially engineered opposition, playing upon ignorance.

1701. You think they did not understand it?—Yes. It has been given out that the Bill in some mysterious way compels people to marry outside their caste. At any rate that is one of the general popular superstitions that exist in India. Many people forgot in the course of the discussion that the Bill is only an enabling one.

1702. And it has been represented that the Bill compels people to marry people they do not want to?—Something of that kind.

1703. You spoke of the popular Assemblies in Mysore and other places. Have they any legislative power of any kind?—The representative Assembly at Mysore is advisory in its character.

1704. Is there any movement in any native State that you know of in the direction of giving legislative powers to those assemblies?—Yes. I was recently consulted by a number of members of the Travancore Legislative Assembly with regard to this matter, and I believe a step is being taken in that assembly. How far it will receive the sanction of the Maharajah or the Imperial Government is a matter of the future.

Chairman.

1705. Why do you say of the Imperial Government?—Because I believe the Government of India reserves to itself the right of what may be called a scrutiny of the policy generally pursued in the native States. It may be that I am wrong, but that is what I am informed.

Mr. Montagu.

1706. I think, Lord Selborne, if we are going into the relations between the native States we had better have expert evidence on it?—I am entirely ignorant on that.

Lord Sydenham.] The question of the native States has been introduced or I should not have introduced it.

Chairman.] I am not in the least objecting to the question, but I think the witness gave a completely erroneous answer, in error, and I should not like the Indian Princes to think that his answer was correct.

Lord Sydenham.

1707. (To the Witness.) Going back to what I was going to say I think you spoke of the great restraint exercised by the Government of India over Provincial Governments in the past. If that restraint is removed to a very great extent, and if the Legislative Councils are in future dominated by elected members and all legislation has to pass those Councils, would not you say that considerable increase of power has been given into Indian hands, taking those two things together.

1708. You will not go so far as to say that it is a good deal of power?—I would not call it effective power.

1709. It is not nearly as much power as you would like to see?—No.

1710. I think you gave some answer which seemed to show that you wish all financial control to be entirely in the hands of the Legislative Council?—Yes.

1711. In that case what would become of the reserved subjects?—I think my answer was this, that the Legislative Council should have an opportunity of discussing, and with some effect, the financial proposals of the Government. I was not for the moment thinking or predicating anything with reference to the reserved subjects, because I take it that the discussion proceeded on the basis of the joint purse as recommended, and of which I am in favour. All the safeguards and limitations demanded by the joint purse system would exist, and it is with reference to that particular state of things that I spoke.

1712. You would admit that if complete financial control passes into the hands of the Legislative Council, the reserved subjects could not be financed at all, or might not be able to be financed at all?—I would not say that at all, because I take it the Legislative Councils in any case would be reasonable enough to say that the reserved subjects are as much the objects of care as the transferred subjects.

Mr. Montagu.

1713. Is it your experience generally that the Local Governments if left to themselves would be more liberally inclined than the Government of India?—It is very difficult for me to answer the question, but my restricted experience of the Madras Government would not enable me to answer it in the affirmative.

1714. With regard to your remarks in answer to Mr. Spoor, he asked you whether you thought there would be any material advantage from the passing of this Bill. I understood him to mean would the material conditions of the people of India be improved?

Mr. Spoor.] My point was this, that if we got improved educational facilities as the result of this Bill, would the material conditions of the people be improved?

1715. I think you and the witness were at cross purposes, because the witness's answer was that the Bill wanted amendments. The amendment you suggest has no effect upon the material condition of the Indian people?—No. No legislation by itself would have any effect on the material condition unless and until the Legislature applied themselves to that condition.

1716. One of the things that you suggest should be incorporated in the Bill is the salary of the Minister?—I am afraid that would not be describing it accurately. What I said was that the fact that his salary was equal to that of the Executive Council member ought to be indicated in the Bill itself, and in answer to the question from Lord Sinha I stated that the amount of the salary was not the material point, and it may be that the salary might not be the same in all Provinces, but in each Province the status and position of the Minister in that Province ought to be exactly the same as the status and position and salary of the Executive Council member.

1717. I do not gather from you that you want the salary so fixed in the Bill that it should not be altered or reduced by the Legislative Council?—Not at all.

1718. Now I want to ask you a question about taxation under the joint purse. Has it ever occurred to you that there may be some difficulty about requiring a Minister always to make the proposals for taxation?—With the safeguards contemplated I should not think that any difficulties would arise, because I take it that taxation, being a transferred subject—I am speaking on that basis—before the Minister makes his taxation proposals, the consultation that is contemplated would have taken place, namely, the needs of the reserved subjects would have been brought forward, and the needs of the transferred subjects emphasised. As the result of that, and in spite of the adjustment that may be effected pro tanto, if it is found that any taxation were necessary, it would fall upon the Minister in charge of that transferred subject.

1719. Supposing there was enough money in the joint purse for both the reserved and transferred subjects, but the expenditure upon a particular reserved subject was increased, and therefore the need for taxation was due to the expansion of a particular reserved subject, would it be fair to ask the Minister to propose that taxation?—I would answer the question in this manner. If the Minister, after the review of the necessities of the transferred subjects as a whole, and of the necessary expansion of a reserved subject, persuaded himself that further taxation was necessary, I think it would not only be the right thing, but advantageous to the future development of the country that the Minister should go to the House and say: "I am convinced that the reserved subject needs expansion, and I therefore advocate taxation."

1720. You heard those who were arguing against the joint purse explaining the dangers of friction which might arise if neither side were satisfied with the Budget provision in any year for the other side?—Yes.

1721. Has it ever occurred to you that if such fears materialise, it might be a good thing to provide for some Board of Arbitration or Appeal Court to settle the difference for a term of years?—Yes. That is already referred to in answer to one of the questions before this Committee. Speaking for myself, it seems to me that that would be a very good expedient to solve any matters that might arise in controversy between the two branches.

1722. Now I come to the Central Government. You, like almost every other Indian witness who has communicated with us or been in the witness chair, want something more than the Bill proposes in the Central Government?—Yes.

1723. And the usual demand is for some beginning of responsibility?—Yes.

1724. Would you mind defining that from your point of view a little bit more closely. What I mean is this: Am I to understand that that means that you would wish for diarchy in the Central Government?—Yes.

1725. A Minister holding office at pleasure with the understanding that he would resign if he lost the confidence of the Legislative Assembly?—Yes.

1726. You have heard very serious doubts expressed by many people in India and in England about the advantages of diarchy at all?—Yes. I am also of the opinion that diarchy is a transitional expedient. I do not regard it as a perfect system, but I regard it as the best that could be devised in view of the conditions which have been postulated.

1727. But you have sufficient belief in it to think that you would advocate it to this Committee both for the Local Governments and for the Central Government?—As I said, so far as the Local Government is concerned, I have indicated in my answer the reasons why I am in favour of diarchy personally. So far as the Central Government is concerned, having regard to the principles of the pronouncement, I hold that some power and responsibility to be transferred to popular representatives is of the essence of the pronouncement itself. Holding that view, it seems to me that the only method by which to carry out that object would be to transfer responsibility in certain selected subjects.

1728. My last question is this. I think you have suggested arguments against the Council of State as a mere registering body?—Yes.

Mr. Montagu—continued.

1729. Supposing it were not a registering body, have you ever considered the possibility that the members of it should be nominated?—Yes. I would say that the election by suitably devised constituencies, devised so as to procure the inclusion in the Council of State of elements which may not be present in the Legislative Assembly, would be a preferable method; but before I go further from the subject, I would say that if that would involve that deliberation and consultation with the local governments and all the correspondence foreseen by the Government of India, that elaborate experimentation would be unnecessary, and in fact productive of harmful results.

1730. Does not the whole reason for the establishment of a reserved subject fall to the ground and vanish if you remove from those who are to administer those reserved subjects the power of taxation for their maintenance?—I do not concede the possibility of the power of taxation being denied to men in charge of the reserved subjects, because I take it that the object of the joint purse system is to secure that the needs of both the departments will be considered in consultation between the Ministry on the one hand and the Governor and the Executive Council on the other, and that, the necessity for taxation being once established, taxation forthwith will be begun.

1731. But the necessity for taxation having been once established, how are you to arrive at that in favour of extra revenue for a reserved subject if you confine the power of taxation to a Minister?—The Minister will be the exponent of the policy of the Government with regard to taxation whether in reference to a reserved subject or a transferred subject. If it is once decided that a reserved subject needs further revenue in order to augment its resources or to expand them, the whole body, that is the Ministers and the Executive Councils, sitting with the assistance of the Governor as mediator, will arrive at a particular result. That result having been arrived at, then taxation will be started.

1732. I understand from that answer that you would accept power on the part of the Executive Council to determine extra taxation, and you would only ask the Minister to be the exponent of it in the Legislative Council?—I am afraid I did not make myself clear. There will be a discussion between the one branch of the Government and the other as to the necessities for taxation. All the arguments pro and con will be advanced.

1733. It is the decision I want to get at?—If there is an irreconcilable conflict between the Executive Council on the one hand and the corporate body of Ministers on the other, the final decision would rest on the Governor whether on the one scheme or the other.

Chairman.] Thank you.

Mr. BENNETT.
Sir HENRY CRAIK.
Mr. MONTAGU.
Major ORMSBY GORE.

Mr. SPOOR.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE EARL OF SELBORNE IN THE CHAIR.

The Hon. Mr. V. J. PATEL and DEWAN V. P. MADHAVA RAO, C.I.E., called; and Examined.

Chairman.

1734. Mr. Patel, you and Mr. Madhava Rao are representing the National Congress?—(Mr. Patel.) We represent the Indian National Congress

1735. You have sent us a general memorandum and also answers to the questions?—Yes, my Lord. (For Memorandum, see Appendix C.)

Chairman—continued.

The questions and answers are as follows:—

1. Do you accept the proposition that it is desirable to bring about the progressive realisation of responsible government in India, and, if so, how do you define the expression "responsible government"? And do you generally accept the proposition

tion contained in the Preamble?—While maintaining that the people of India are fit for full responsible government, which it would be desirable, therefore, to introduce at once, the Indian National Congress, in order to facilitate the passage of reforms and save time which might otherwise have been lost in controversy, has welcomed the announcement of August 20, 1917, that the establishment of responsible government in India is the goal of British policy. But it holds that Indians should be the judges of the time and measure of the advances to be made, and has demanded (by resolution passed at its session at Calcutta in 1917) that the realisation of full responsible government should be guaranteed to India, within a period not exceeding fifteen years, in the proposed Statute of Reforms. Responsible government is a system of government in which the Executive is responsible to a popularly elected Legislature, and therefore holding office while it enjoys the confidence of that Legislature. The aim of the Congress is the establishment of such government in the whole of British India to the extent it has been introduced in the self-governing Dominions. In other words, the Congress demands Dominion Responsible Government or Dominion Home Rule. The Congress does not accept the terms of the Preamble as they stand, and urges that the whole of the Preamble should be amended as proposed in Part II. of the Memorandum of Evidence submitted on behalf of the Congress to the Committee. The effect of these proposed amendments would be to guarantee the establishment, within a period not exceeding fifteen years, of full responsible government in British India, and to ensure that the devolution of powers and responsibility as between Parliament and the Government of India on the one hand, and the Government of India and the Provincial Governments on the other, should depend upon a corresponding devolution of powers and responsibility to the popular Legislature, as well as an increasing association of Indians in every branch of administration.

2. Do you think that the realisation of responsible government in the Provinces involves the establishment in Provincial Legislatures of a substantial elected majority (Clause 6)?—We think that it involves the establishment of fully elective Councils. The Congress urges, however, that to begin with, at least four-fifths of the members should be elected.

3. Do you think that the non-official members of the Provincial Legislatures should possess power to control the actions and policy of the Executive? Do you think they possess such power at present?—It is necessary that they should. At present they possess no such power.

4. Do you think that there are certain matters or functions of government in the Provinces in which at present the Provincial Executive must remain responsible to the Secretary of State and Parliament, and must therefore be in a position to enforce its wishes?—We do not think so. The Congress asks for full responsible government in the Provinces.

5. If you accept the propositions stated under questions 1 to 4 do you think that the dual form of government embodied in the Bill is the best means of securing them? If not, what are your objections to that feature of the Bill, and by what other means would you attempt to secure the objects in view?—As the Congress does not accept the propositions stated in questions 1 to 4 in their entirety, it is not in favour of the dual form of government embodied in the Bill. Its objections are explained generally in the Memorandum of Evidence already submitted to the Committee. Briefly, they are as follows:—(1) That the Congress holds that India is fit for responsible government, and that anything less than full responsible government in the Provinces could not satisfy the people, even as a first step. (2) That the scheme embodied in the Bill is not calculated to achieve the goal aimed at in the Declaration of Policy contained in the Announcement of August, 1917. The means proposed by the Congress are contained in its resolutions printed as Appendix I. in the Memorandum already submitted.

6. If you have any other method to suggest, does it (i) provide possibilities of advance by stages and facilitate the "progressive realisation of responsible government," and if it does, in what way (Clause 2, 3, etc.), and (ii) does it afford means of judgment, (a) to the electors and (b) to the Statutory Commission which is to examine and report on progress of the success or failure in results of the control exercised by the Legislature and those who represent it in the Executive?—The method proposed by the Indian National Congress does provide for advance by stages. According to the resolutions of the Congress, all matters affecting peace and war, the Navy, the Army and the Air Force, treaties and foreign relations (other than commercial treaties), relations with Indian ruling princes, and all matters directly affecting the peace, tranquility and defence of the country (subject to the Declaration of Rights set out on page 4 of the Memorandum), would be left at the first stage to be dealt with by the Executive uncontrolled by the Legislature, and some of them would be transferred to popular control in course of time after providing all necessary safeguards for the maintenance of India's connection with the British Empire. The resolutions of the Congress also fall short of responsible government on other matters. To mention a few of them, (1) financial autonomy is subject to a serious qualification enabling the Governor-General to over-ride the decision of the Legislature. (2) The Executive in the Government of India need not command the confidence of the Legislature, and will not be bound to go out of office by reason of an adverse vote. (3) There will be no one corresponding to the Premier in the British system and, therefore, the head of the Government will be the real, and not merely the nominal, head of the Executive. (4) The Legislature will not be wholly elective. These and other similar matters in which the resolutions of the Congress fall short of the essentials of full responsible government also provide scope for advance by stages. In our view, the Congress scheme is the only one yet put forward which will facilitate the progressive realisation of responsible government in India, if such realisation of the goal is seriously intended to be attained as early as possible and is not to remain an expression of a mere pious wish. (ii) We welcome the assumption contained in the first part of this question that the electors are to be judges of the success or failure of this experiment. The Congress does not admit the claim of otthers to be the judges. Our views in regard to the proposed Statutory Commission are expressed in our answer to question 17.

7. If you consider a dual form of government, acceptable in principle, are there any points of detail the modification of which you regard as necessary? If so, what are those points, and what modifications would you suggest?—We are not in favour of a dual form of government in the Provinces. We propose full responsible government in the Provinces.

8. In particular, do you think (i) that Ministers should hold office "during pleasure"—i.e., should be liable to removal if they are unable to support the action decided upon in their Department by the Governor or if they fail to retain the confidence of the Legislature (Clause 3 (1))? (ii) that the Governor should have power to disregard the opinion of his Ministers if he considers that action in accordance with that opinion is inconsistent with the due discharge of his responsibilities (Clause 3 (3))? (iii) that the Executive Council should in all Provinces normally consist of one official European and one non-official Indian (Clause 4)? (iv) that the Governor should have power to dissolve his Legislative Council (Clause 7 (4))?—An answer to this question, to be strictly relevant, would be based on the assumption of our acceptance of the scheme embodied in the Bill. That scheme, we have already stated, we do not accept, but we think it is desirable to state our view of what should be the position in the matters referred to in the question under the Congress scheme. (i) Ministers should hold office "during pleasure," using the phrase in its Constitutional stitutional sense. In practice it follows that Ministers who are responsible to the Legislature would have to resign if they fail to retain the confidence of that body. (ii) We consider that the Governor should have no power to disregard the opinions of his Ministers beyond that already contained in Sec. 50 of the prinicpal Act. (iii) According to Congress proposals the Executive Council would consist entirely of Ministers appointed from the elected members of the Legislative Council. We make no distinction between Europeans and Indians. (iv) The Governor should have power to dissolve his Legislative Council provided that he shall appoint a date not more than three months after the date of the dissolution for the next sessions of the Council.

9. Referring back to questions 2, 3 and 4, if your answers to the first and third of these are in the affirmative, and if you think that the legislatures should be given greater powers of control and influence than they possess at present, do you regard the limitations imposed generally by Clause 9 of the Bill upon their financial and legislative powers as (i) suitable, or as (ii) unnecessarily severe, or as (iii) inadequate to safeguard the responsibilities which the Government owes in the last resort to Parliament (Clause 9)?—As the Congress disapproves of diarchy in the Provinces and proposes full responsible government, any limitation on the powers of control of the Provincial Legislature, except as regards the emergency power of the Governor, are unnecessary and undesirable.

10. In particular, (i) do you think that the Legislature should have power with whatever limitations to vote supplies (Clause 9 (2))? (ii) Do you accept the plan of Grand Committees as the means of giving to the Government the power to secure essential legislation in the event of their failure to carry their propositions in the Council? If so, have you any modifications of detail to suggest? If not, what other method would you suggest to secure the object in view?—It follows from the foregoing that we consider that the Legislature must have power without limitation to vote supplies. We do not accept the plan of the Grand Committee, nor is any such limitation necessary under the scheme we propose.

11. Do you accept the position adopted in the Bill (Part II.) that the time has not yet come to give the Legislative Assembly a similar measure of control over the Central Government as that given to Provincial Legislative Councils over Provincial Governments?—We do not accept the position. We regard it as incompatible with the announcement of August 20th, 1917. We have already indicated the extent to which the Congress demands that the Indian Legislature should control the Central Government at the present stage.

12. Do you agree that it is advisable, none the less, to provide for a substantial elective majority in the Indian Legislature (Clause 16)?—We think that in any case at least four-fifths of the Indian Legislature should be elected members.

13. Do you accept the plan of a bi-cameral Legislature as arising out of this, as constituting both a satisfactory machine for the ordinary purposes of legislation and as affording the means to the Governor-General in Council to secure legislation which he regards as essential (Clauses 14, 15 and 16)?—We do not accept the plan of a bi-cameral Legislature. In our view, a Council of State such as is proposed in the Bill would act only as a barrier to the expression of the popular will. The Congress in its resolution urges, however, that if the Council of State is to be established at least one-half of its members should be elected.

14. Do you accept the provisions of the Bill as to the course of legislation in the Indian Legislature (Clause 20 (3) and (4)? Or do you regard them as unnecessarily restrictive on the popular will, or as an inadequate means of ensuring to the Governor-General in Council the discharge of his responsibilities?—As already stated, we are opposed to the establishment of the Second Chamber proposed by the Bill. The form of the Indian Legislature which we advocate is outlined in the Congress resolutions under the heading "Government of India" (see Memorandum of Evidence, page 15). We regard the provisions of the Bill in this respect as undoubtedly unnecessarily and, we think, dangerously, restrictive of the popular will, and also as providing more than adequate, and, therefore, undesirable means of ensuring to the Governor-General in Council the discharge of his responsibility. Under the scheme we propose, all subjects except Army Navy, foreign relations, relations with ruling princes, peace, tranquility and defence of the country would be transferred to Ministers appointed from the elected members of the Assembly. In the event of the Legislative Assembly refusing to pass any measure which the Governor-General in Council may consider essential for the safety, tranquillity or defence of British India, we propose that he should have power to pass such law without the assent of the Legislative Assembly for one year and that the law should only be renewed after that period if 40 per cent. of the members of the Assemby present and voting are in favour of it. We consider t this provision will afford adequate means to the Governor-General in Council to secure the passage of a measure which he may consider so urgently necessary to the discharge of his responsibility as to justify him in over-riding for the time being the will of the Assembly. It appears to us, however, obviously undesirable that a measure enacted against the wishes of the popular representatives should be of a permanent character, and we consider that a year should be a sufficient period in which public opinion may be brought to realise, either that the measure is of an essential character or that it is not dangerous to the liberties or interests of the people.

15. Do you accept the changes made by the Bill (Clause 21) in the constitution of the Governor-General's Executive Council? If not, what are your reasons, and what modifications would you suggest?—We have adopted in regard to the Government of India the dual form of an Executive Council proposed in the Bill for the Provinces, in order to secure in the Government of India adequate popular control in all matters not "reserved" as previously indicated. We ask that half the members of the Executive Council, in charge of "reserved" subjects, if there is more than one, shall be Indians, and that Ministers, who shall be elected members of the Assembly, shall be appointed to administer all non-reserved subjects, such Ministers to be on an equality in pay and status with the members of the Executive Council. We are not in favour of ten years' service of the Crown in India being made a condition of membership of the Executive Council for any of its members. The practice of having permanent officials as heads of Departments contributes, in our opinion, more than anything else to the maintenance of woodenness and inelasticity and an inadequate sense of responsibility in the Government of India.

16. Do you think that the development of Provinical autonomy on the one hand, and of self-government in the Provinces on the other, involves any modifications of the provisions of Sections 2, 33 and 45 of the Government of India Act (Clause 23)?—We should regard with great suspicion all modifications of the power of control over the Governments in India by the Secretary of State and Parliament, except where the measure of control that is relinquished by Parliament or the Secretary of State passes definitely into the hands of the representatives of the people. Any deviation from this principle, which we consider essential for the protection of the people against the admitted dangers of the existence of an imperfectly or inadequately controlled bureaucracy, would tend to lessen the sense of responsibility in the Government. We should be in favour of wide relaxation of control by the Secretary of State, if our proposals for full responsibility in the Provinces and partial responsibility in the Central Government were accepted, to the extent to which control is transferred to the popular Assemblies.

17. Do you agree that the gradual realisation of responsible government involves periodical examination

tion of progress by independent authority, and that the provisions of Clause 28 of the Bill are well designed to afford such examination?—We do not agree that the proposed Statutory Commission at the end of ten years should have power to suggest or recommend or report on the desirability of modification of the degree of responsibility then existing in any Province. The Commission should inquire and report only as to whether the ten years' experiment does not justify the immediate grant of full responsible government in the whole of British India, or whether another period of five years should be allowed to pass before doing so.

18. Are there any matters which it is proposed in the Bill to deal with by rule which you would suggest should be provided for in the Bill?—Yes. They are indicated in the proposed amendments to the Bill (Part II., page 8, of the Memorandum of Evidence).

19. Have you any observations to offer on the Reports of Lord Southborough's Committees and of the Committee on the Home Administration of Indian Affairs?—Our observations on the Report of Lord Southborough's Committee are contained in Part III. of our Memorandum of Evidence (page 12). Regarding the Report of the Committee on the Home Administration of Indian Affairs, the Congress is strongly in favour of the abolition of the India Council and is not in favour of the substitution of any other body for it. We recommend that there should be two permanent Under-Secretaries at the India Office, one of whom should be an Indian. The Congress considers that all the charges in respect to the India Office establishment should be placed on the British Estimates.

1736. Have you anything you wish to say in supplement to those two documents?—I should like to explain the position of the Indian National Congress in regard to the Reform Bill. Before I do so I must express my gratitude to your Lordship's Committee for inquiring of me whether I would like to give evidence in camera. So far as that is concerned, the Congress has nothing to say in private. Our proceedings and our programme are open to public criticism, and there is nothing of which we are afraid. I must introduce myself in the first instance to your Lordship's Committee. I am the General Secretary of the Indian National Congress and the Secretary of the Bombay Provincial Congress Committee. I am also an elected member of the Imperial or rather Indian Legislative Council, as it is called, and have served for six years as a member of the Bombay Legislative Council. I may add that I was Chairman of the Reception Committee of the Special Sessions of the Congress held at Bombay to consider the Reform Report. The object of the Indian National Congress is the attainment by the people of India of Dominion Home Rule, or, to put it in the words of the Announcement, responsible Government as an integral part of the British Empire.

1737. That is all very clearly stated in your Memorandum?—Quite right.

1738. I would suggest that you should not repeat anything which is in your Memorandum, only supplement it, please?—By way of explaining the Memorandum I may have to refer to some statements in it, with your Lordship's permission.

1739. In elucidation?—Yes. I should like to make it perfectly clear that the Congress does not demand or even desire for one single moment separation from the British Empire. We are all anxious to remain part of the Empire, not as we are, but as a self-governing part as other self-governing parts are. That is our position. The Congress holds that the people of India are ripe and fit for responsible government now. That is the position of the Congress. But the question naturally arises: If the people are fit, why do not we ask for it—why do not we ask for full responsible government? It is true we have not asked for full responsible government, and my reasons are these: The announcement regarding His Majesty's policy in British India was made on the 20th August, 1917. After that announcement was made we met in the Indian National Congress which was held at Calcutta, and we considered the announcement in all its aspects; we considered it very carefully. The announcement, as your Lordship knows very well, pledges His Majesty's Government to a policy of progressive realisation of responsible government, and it pledges His Majesty's Government to take substantial steps in that direction without delay. In this connection I may state that in making that announcement the Secretary of State explained that progress in this policy can only be achieved by successive stages, and that the British Government and the Government of India must be the judges of the time and measure of each advance. We considered the announcement and the cautious explanatory phrases of the Secretary of State in making that announcement. The Indian National Congress does not regard those phrases as part of His Majesty's announcement.

1740. But as a matter of fact they were?—If your Lordship will turn to page 5 of the Report the Secretary of State says: "I would add that progress in this policy can only be achieved by successive stages. The British Government and the Government of India, on whom the responsibility lies for the welfare and advancement of the Indian peoples, must be the judges of the time and measure of each advance."

1741. You may take it from me, in the presence of the Secretary of State, that that is a part of the announcement, and was always so intended to be?—That may be your Lordship's view; that is not the view of the Congress. The Congress holds that it is not part of the announcement.

1742. It is not for me, or you, or the Congress; it is for His Majesty's Government, and they say so?—I am very sorry to hear that. When we met in the Indian National Congress to consider this announcement we passed a certain resolution, and in order to avoid any misunderstanding I will read that resolution to your Lordship's Committee: "This Congress expresses its grateful satisfaction over the pronouncement made by His Majesty's Secretary of State for India on behalf of the Imperial Government, that its object is the establishment of responsible government in India. This Congress strongly urges the necessity for the immediate enactment of a Parliamentary Statute providing for the establishment of reponsible government in India, the full measure to be attained within a time limit to be fixed in the Statute itself at an early date. This Congress is emphatically of opinion that the Congress-League Scheme of Reforms ought to be immediately introduced by the Statute as the first step in the process."

In this resolution we clearly set out what the substantial steps towards the realisation of responsible government should be, and we made it clear that we were not prepared to accept undefined stages, and that a time limit should be laid down in the Statute itself for the realisation of responsible government; and in moving that resolution the Hon. Mr. Surendranath Banerjea said: "I have no hesitation in saying that this Proclamation is a memorable triumph of the Congress, and it adds one to the series of such triumphs, and you have rightly embodied it in the resolution. But there is a rift in the lute. The message says that the measure of self-government and the time for its introduction are to be determined by the Government of India and the British democracy. We are the people who are most concerned in the matter—concerned far more closely than either the Government of India or the British democracy. We claim the right to have a voice in the matter, and here we take our stand on the dictum of the Prime Minister himself. He said, in the course of one of his recent speeches, that when, after the war, the question of resettlement was to be considered—mark the words —'the wishes of the people are to be the supreme consideration.' I am grateful to him for the admission, and the Congress should be grateful for it—but he also added that the formula is not to be fettered by considerations of lattitude and longitude, and that it is equally applicable to the tropical climates. We, therefore take our stand upon this dictum, and press for the recognition of this formula in the coming readjustment of the Government of India." Then the Secretary of State and the Viceroy made certain inquiries as to the substantial steps to be taken in the direction suggested in the announcement. They made the inquiry and submitted their report to Parliament in June or July, 1918. After that report was published, the Indian

Indian National Congress met as previously determined, specially to consider the recommendations contained in it. It met at Bombay, and I had, as I have already mentioned, the honour to be the Chairman of the Reception Committee. We considered the recommendations of the Report, and we held that those recommendations were unsatisfactory and disappointing, and, further, we emphasised the stand that we had taken at our Calcutta Sessions. It is a small resolution. I will not read the modifications suggested, but refer only to the main resolution: "That this Congress reaffirms the principles of Reform contained in the resolutions relating to self-government adopted in the Indian National Congress and the All-India Muslim League, held at Lucknow in December, 1916, and at Calcutta in December, 1917, and declares that nothing less than self-government within the Empire can satisfy the Indian people, and by enabling it to take its rightful place as a free and self-governing nation in the British Commonwealth, strengthen the connection between Great Britain and India." "That this Congress declares that the people of India are fit for responsible government, and repudiates the assumption to the contrary contained in the Report on Indian Constitutional Reforms." "That this Congress appreciates the earnest attempt on the part of the Right Honourable the Secretary of State and His Excellency the Viceroy to inaugurate a system of responsible government in India, and while it recognises that some of the proposals constitute an advance on the present conditions in some directions, it is of opinion that the proposals, as a whole, are disappointing and unsatisfactory, and suggests the following modifications as absolutely necessary to constitute a substantial step towards responsible government." Then it goes on to suggest the modifications. That was at the Special Sessions held at Bombay two or three months after the Reform Report was published. We then met in our ordinary annual Sessions at Delhi in December, and again considered the recommendations in the Report in the light of the public criticisms in regard to them, and in regard to the resolutions we had passed at Bombay, and we re-emphasised the stand we had taken at Calcutta and also at Bombay. We re-affirmed those resolutions, and added one important resolution. That was in regard to self-determination: "In view of the pronouncement of President Wilson, Mr. Lloyd George, and other British statesmen, that to ensure the future peace of the world the principle of self-determination should be applied to all progressive nations, be it resolved (1) that this Congress claims the recognition of India by the British Parliament and by the Peace Conference as one of the progressive nations to whom the principle of self-determination should be applied." So your Lordship will see what the position of the Congress is To put it in two words, we accept the announcement of August 20th in favour of the progressive realisation of responsible government, but within the limit of that memorable announcement we claim the right to determine for ourselves the time and measure of each advance. That, to put it shortly, is our position. The modifications I am not going to deal with in detail. The modifications suggested by the Congress are, briefly speaking, as follows:—First, we say that there should be full Provincial autonomy, or, to be strictly correct, full responsible government in the Provinces. The Reform Report proposes to transfer only a few subjects in the Provinces. We demand that all the subjects should be transferred. Secondly, the Reform Report proposes no responsibility in the Government of India. We claim that in the Government of India there should be introduced some measure of responsibility, and we have defined what that measure should be. We say that the Army, the Navy, the Air Force, the Peace and Treaty, foreign affairs, relations with Ruling Princes, and subjects affecting the peace, tranquillity, and defence of the country—subject to what we call the declaration of rights, and about which I shall have to say something later on—all these subjects should be reserved to the Executive, and the remaining subjects, which practically are all the subjects regarding internal affairs, should be handed over to the representatives of the people. That is the responsibility that we ask for in the Government of India. Then thirdly, we ask for fiscal autonomy. We lay particular stress on it in view of our industrial conditions in India. Fourthly, we say that a time limit must be fixed in the Statute, a time limit of fifteen years, within which full responsible government should be introduced in the whole of British India. Fifthly, we want the abolition of the Council of State. These are briefly the demands of the Indian National Congress.

1743. We have them all fully set forth in the memorandum?—Yes, we have them fully set forth in detail in the memorandum of evidence. I should very much like to amplify what I have stated so far by reference to the memorandum of evidence which we have submitted. In the first three pages of our memorandum we have stated our position quite clearly, and if your Lordship permits me to read that part of the memorandum, and that part only, to your Lordship's Committee, I should be much obliged.

1744. Do not read more than you need?—No. In the first three pages we say:—

"The Indian National Congress was founded in 1885 to advocate reforms in the government and administration of the country and to bring about an adequate measure of popular representation and control over the legislative and administrative machinery. It has for the past thirty-three years at its annual sessions and through its provincial and district affiliated bodies, which hold frequent public conferences and in other ways provide scope for public discussion and development of political opinion, steadily and with increasing force pressed for reforms of such a character. Its object is the attainment of self-government within the Empire on the lines of that now enjoyed by the self-governing Dominions. It represents to-day the overwhelming body of opinion among the people of India. Its constitution and organisation are of the widest democratic kind. Its delegates are elected throughout the country by or through the various affiliated bodies and at public meetings, and membership is open to every British subject in India of either sex, and of any class, creed, or race, who is willing to attend its session, provided he or she is 21 years of age and has formally subscribed to its constitution. The session at Delhi was attended by about 5,400 delegates, who included a large number of cultivators. The resolutions passed at the Delhi session are almost identical with those passed at the meeting of the All-India Moslim League held at the same time, the two bodies having been in consultation through their committees with a view to working on a common ground with a common object.

"We venture to impress upon the Committee, therefore, that the Resolutions of the Congress, which we are here to press for the acceptance of Parliament by embodiment in amendments to the Bill under consideration, represent the considered opinion, in an overwhelming measure, of the people of India, after the fullest public discussion of the proposals contained in the Report of Mr. Montagu and Lord Chelmsford on Indian reforms; and we feel that we should be failing in our responsibility to the great interests we represent and the trust confided to us if we were not to point out that, so far as public opinion in India is concerned, we speak with an authority which is indisputable; that we are putting forward demands in the form of amendments to the Bill which are the least that can satisfy the people of the country as a fulfilment, in the popular view, of the terms of the announcement of August 20th, 1917, and lead to the acceptance of the Reform Bill as a measure which would help to restore peace and contentment in the country, and provide the opportunities for self-realisation and national development which are as essential to the interests of Great Britain and the whole Empire as they are vital to those of India. We urge most earnestly the full acceptance by the Committee, having regard to the foregoing considerations, of the amendments to the Bill which we have ventured to propose, to give effect to the demands of the Congress. These are explained as briefly as possible hereunder.

"We desire, first, however, to state without reservation, that the Indian National Congress cannot accept the assumption contained in the Report on Indian Constitutional Reforms that the people of India are as yet unfit for full responsible government. The principle of Self-Determination has been accepted by the British Government and its Allies as the essential principle to be applied to all civilised peoples. In the case of India, the immediate grant of responsible government, qualified only by the reservations necessary to its position as an integral part of the British Empire (inclusion in which is a cardinal point in the constitution of the Congress, and is fully adhered to, with insignificant exceptions, by every shade of Indian opinion), is the logical expression of that principle. The question of the fitness of a people to manage their own affairs is not to be decided by such specious considerations as are put forward in the Report on Indian Constitutional Reforms. The principle of the right of every people to govern themselves is the basic fact which must be assaulted, if that right is to be withheld; and, while there may be reasons sufficiently strong to remove it from consideration, if attempt is made to apply it to a barbaric or semi-civilised peoples or races which may be considered to be otherwise disqualified or unequal to such responsibility, these cannot be advanced with regard to a people whose civilisation is the oldest existing in the world, who managed their own kingdoms and empires as large as the British Empire in India long before the establishment of British rule in the country, who possess ancient traditions of democratic government, among whom municipal institutions of an essentially democratic character only ceased to exist after the advent of British rule, whose country is economically in so large a measure self-contained and in need only of free development, and whose claim to the same Imperial protection as that so long enjoyed by the self-governing Dominions is based on the indisputable ground of the immensity of their past and present contributions to the military power and economic welfare of the Empire.

"But apart from these broad and unassailable considerations, it is impossible to accept the reason which prevented the authors of the Report on Indian Constitutional Reforms from proposing a scheme of immediate, full, responsible government for India and resulted in the embodiment in this Bill of the meagre and unsatisfying proposals now under consideration by the Committee. Briefly these reasons are:—1. The absence of trained electorates of sufficient dimensions. 2. The setting-up of an oligarchy of educated classes to govern the illiterate masses whose interests they would not be so well fitted to represent as an alien bureaucracy. 3. Racial diversities and religious animosities.

"These are reasons which have not stood in the way of the achievements of responsible government by any modern State. Under the very limited franchise proposals of the Southborough Committee about 2½ per cent. of the population in the provinces of British India would be enfrachised. In Bombay, Bengal and the United Provinces the proportion is about 3 per cent. Even in the United Kingdom, three years after the passing of the great Reform Bill of 1832, only 3.3 of the total population enjoyed the franchise, and as late as 1881 the proportion had only grown to 8.9 per cent. In 1880 only 1 per cent. of the poulation could exercise the vote in Sweden, and until 1882 the Chamber of Deputies in Italy was elected by 2½ per cent. of the population. Large electorates in most self-governing countries have only grown up in recent years. It was not until after the Reform Bill of 1884 was passed in the United Kingdom that 15 per cent. of the population became enfranchised, and in the United States as late as 1888 only 17.6 per cent. of the people enjoyed the right to vote. In all countries responsibility in the beginning has been entrusted to a very small section of the people, and government has been in the hands of a small educated minority, who have naturally cared for the interests of the uneducated masses pending the spread of education and the consequent extension of the franchise. The suggestion that the educated leaders of Indian opinion could not similarly be safely entrusted with the welfare of the masses is entirely falsified by the history of the last fifty years, which has been one of constant struggle between them and the bureaucratic administration for redress of the grievances and extension of the rights of the masses. The extent to which this has been the case is amply borne out in the remarkable memorandum which was presented to Mr. Montagu and Lord Chelmsford by Sir Dinshah Wacha and other leaders of the 'Moderate' party in 1918, and in the dissenting Minute of Sir C. Sankaran Nair, annexed to the Despatch of the Government of India of March 5th (East India Constitutional Reforms Cmd. 123). But there can be no possible danger of an educated oligarchy coming into power because the Constitution would be democratic from the beginning, and, as the franchise is extended, as it is sure to be in course of time, there would be no danger of a small minority ever assuming or usurping power. Nor have racial diversity or religious animosities ever been a bar to the achievement and successful working of self-governing institutions in other countries This was notably the case in some of the self-governing Dominions of the British Empire. Canada was granted full responsibility at a time when racial and religious animosities were at the most acute stage, and when the population was certainly far below the standard, in respect of education and training, laid down for India in the Report on Indian Constitutional Reforms; yet what is now held to be a bar in the case of India was regarded, and, as it proved, rightly so, as a solvent in the case of Canada. We believe that equally in India the grant of full responsibilty and the removal of all her political fetters would prove the surest solvent of all such problems. At the same time we would point out that the difficulties of this kind, to which reference is made in the Report, have been greatly exaggerated. Hindus and Moslems have lived for centuries side by side in socal intercourse and mutually helpful brotherhood. Nothing has been more striking in the past few years, and is more evident to-day, than their recognition of and devotion to a common nationhood. This was evidenced by the agreement reached at Lucknow in 1917 on the much-vexed problem of Mahomedan representation. Hindu and Moslem leaders sitting round a table found a solution of a question which bristled with difficulties, and in regard to which it would have been easy to excite jealousies and animosity had not the determination existed on both sides to place the interests of India and the Indian people as a nation above everything. The Lucknow Compact has been accepted by the Southborough Committee. Religious disputes and consequent disturbances are only spasmodic and local, as they are in other countries; moreover, they are conspicuous by their absence in the States under Indian rule, and they are infrequently provoked and aggravated in British India by external causes and interference, which need not be described here.

"The delegates of the Congress are thus unable to understand why special and peculiar standards of fitness for responsibility, which have never been applied to other countries, should be erected as a barrier against the immediate grant to the people of India of that right to a government set up by and answerable to the people, which has been so uncompromisingly asserted during the past few years by British statesmen, of every shade of opinion, to be the inalienable right of all civilised peoples.

"In accepting, with satisfaction, the declaration in the Announcement of August 20th, 1917, that self-government is the goal of British policy in India, the National Congress, at its Session in Calcutta in the following December, repudiated the claim of others to decide for India the time and measure of the stages by which it should be achieved, as a negation of the recognised principle of self-determination. And when it came to consider, at its special Session called for the purpose at Bombay in August, 1918, the proposals contained in the Report on Indian Constitutional Reforms, while adhering to the principles ciples of reform contained in the Congress-League scheme and regarding the proposals in the Report as 'unsatisfactory and disappointing,' it drew up resolutions for the modification of those proposals and abandoned its own scheme, only in order to facilitate the passage of reforms. But even so, it was found that opinion in the country, subsequently very strongly manifested through Provincial and District Conferences, public meetings, and even the Legislative Councils, was so definitely and emphatically determined upon the immediate achievement of full responsibility in the Provinces, that, at the following session at Delhi, in December of last year, an amending resolution, calling for full responsible government in the Provinces at once, without prejudice to the claim for a substantial measure of responsibility in the Central Government, was passed by an overwhelming majority, only a few delegates out of over 5,000 voting in favour of the retention of the Bombay Resolution.

"We now put the Congress demands before the Committee in the form of suggested amendments to the Bill. Before proceeding to explain them in detail, we would again urge upon the Committee the representative character in which we appear before them as the accredited delegates of the most representative popular institution in India, with a definite mandate to urge upon the Parliament of the United Kingdom that the Indian people cannot be satisfied with anything else." . . .

"We wish again to emphasise one important fact, to which we have already referred in connection with these demands. The Bombay Special Congress, which met to consider the Reform proposals of the Joint Report, resolved that the subjects of law, justice, and police should, for a period of six years, be reserved and administered by the Executive Government of each Province. This resolution did not find favour with the people; they pressed for full responsible government immediately in the Provinces, through the Legislative Councils, political associations, and public meetings. In response to public opinion, so emphatically expressed throughout the country, the Delhi Congress in December last resolved, in modification of the Bombay Congress Resolution on the subject, that, 'in view of the expression of opinion in the country since the sitting of the said special Session, this Congress is of opinion that, so far as the Provinces are concerned, full responsible government should be granted at once.' The feeling among the delegates of the Congress was so strong that they, in order to guard against the possible danger of any attempt to minimise their demands on this question, further resolved that the deputation proceeding to England should advocate and press the demands of the Congress as contained in the resolutions of the Congress.

"We submit that the proposals of the Joint Report, intended to solve the political problems of India, have failed to satisfy the aspirations of India as expressed in the Congress resolutions. The authors of the Report have not carried out substantially the spirit of the Declaration of the 20th August. They have put too narrow and too strict a construction on the wording of that announcement. They have declined to grant full responsible government to any Province, and they propose to maintain the Central Government in as bureaucratic a form as ever. The authors of the Report, in taking this course, have altogether missed the real issue, for the solution of which their task of proposing constitutional reforms for India was undertaken. They do not propose to solve the greatest of all problems in India —viz., Fiscal Autonomy, without which all other reforms are almost valueless. We do not find any recommendation in this Report for the abolition of the India Council, which is left untouched in the Bill. They do not even suggest the probable period within which the goal of full responsibility can be reached, much less do they recommend the fixing of any such time limit in the Statute to be passed.

"The demand of the Congress for a declaration of the rights of the people of India as British citizens—viz., that all Indians are equal before the law, equally entitled to a licence to bear arms and to enjoy freedom of speech, writing, and meeting, and also the freedom of the Press, and that no one should be punished or deprived of his liberty except by a sentence of a court of justice, has been met by the Rowlatt Act, passed in the teeth of the unanimous Indian opinion of the country both in and outside the Legislative Council.

"Coming to the Bill itself, we regret to say that the proposals contained therein are even less acceptable than the unsatisfactory and disappointing recommendations of the Joint Report. We have carefully gone through its provisions and compared them with the recommendations of the Joint Report. A list of points in which the Bill goes back on this Report is attached herewith, and marked Appendix II. We invite the special attention of the Joint Committee to a few of the more important of them; they are points Nos. 7, 10, 12, 13, 14, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 29, 32, 33, 44, 47, 48, 49, 50 in the list.

"In concluding this portion of our Memorandum we desire to impress upon the Committee the danger of allowing the Bill as it stands to pass into law. The salvation of India at this supremely critical juncture, both as regards its individual existence and its position as one of the basic foundations of the British Empire, lies in the transfer of responsibility and control in the government and administration of the country from the hands of the bureaucracy to those of the representatives of the people. The Bill makes generous provision for the transfer of control, not from the bureaucracy to the people, but from Parliament to the bureaucracy, while allowing only a very limited and tentative experiment in 'responsible administration' in order that the people of the country may undergo a training in 'responsibility,' to be carried out by instructors who have had no such training themselves, but whose mental equipment and experience in the working of forms of government and administration make them singularly ill-fitted to be entrusted with such a task. The limited powers to be granted to the popular representatives are to be surrounded by such an effective entanglement of barbed wire, in the form of checks, safeguards, and saving clauses as to leave the Governor of a Province, as Sir Donald McLean aptly pointed out in the debate on the second reading, still in the possession of 'almost despotic powers.' If this is to be the effect of a Bill which, at the same time, removes to a large extent the control of the Secretary of State and Parliament over executive authority in India, the Indian people will have little for which to be grateful. The speech of the Secretary of State on the second reading was the strongest justification of the demand of India for the fullest possible measure of responsible government. The Bill gives little more than limited responsibility in municipal affairs, and leaves the people still at the mercy of executive authority in all the departments which vitally affect their interests, and without the right to the final voice in the spending of the revenues of the country.

"The Government of Bombay make alternative proposals to those of the Joint Report, which show that they are in favour of a scheme for the Provinces which approximates more closely to the demands which we put forward than the proposals of the Bill. In view of the accusation that has been freely made in this country that the Congress has made extreme demands at the bidding of 'extremist' leaders, we would emphasise that the Congress, generally speaking, is asking for little more than is proposed by the Government of Bombay under Lord Willingdon. However that may be, we urge that our demands are the least which can be described as a 'substantial step' of the kind intended by the terms of the Announcement of 1917, or which can be accepted by the people of India as an adequate measure of justice to them."

Having made these preliminary observations I should now like to explain to this Committee one point on which much stress has been laid by some people; I mean the point regarding the differences in our camp—the differences on the question of Indian Constitutional Reforms. We have in India the Indian National Congress and the Muslim League, and we have three Home Rule Leagues, the All-India Home

Rule League, the Indian Home Rule League, and the National Home Rule League, and we have the All-India Moderate Conference. These are practically the more important political institutions in the whole of India. The differences, of course, are mostly on matters of detail. On matters of principle we differ on one point only, and that is in regard to diarchy. The Congress holds that there should be no diarchy in the Provinces; the Home Rule Leagues hold that there should be no diarchy; at any rate I know that the two Home Rule Leagues, the Indian Home Rule League and the All-India Home Rule League, and also the Moslim League agree in holding that all the subjects in the Provinces should be transferred. I may say here that the third Home Rule League, that represented by Mrs. Besant here, holds that there should be diarchy also in the Provinces, but the diarchy which the National Home Rule League proposes is not the diarchy which the Report proposes. They say——

1745. We cannot have your evidence about Mrs. Besant's Home Rule League. You can state the difference between your League and the Conference; that is all you can say?—I do not want to go into that question I merely want to point out that the difference between the Indian National Congress and the Moslim League on the one hand, and Mrs. Besant's Home Rule League on the other is this: They want that the subjects of law, justice, and police should be with the Executive Government for six years, and that those subjects must automatically go to the representatives of the people at the end of six years, while the Congress holds that we must have them now. That is the only difference between them and us. Then, as regards the Moderate Conference, the resolution passed at their meeting is quite clear. They want as many subjects as possible to be transferred to the popular representatives in the Provinces. That is the main difference.

1746. Speak for your own Congress, please?—I am supported by the resolutions of the Moderate Conference passed at its first session.

1747. It is my business to prevent the duplication of evidence. We have had the evidence of all those bodies?—I bow to your Lordship's ruling. Will I be in order in pointing out to your Lordship's Committee the points on which all the deputations agree? If your Lordship permits me I should like to shortly put before your Lordship the points on which the entire Indian opinion is agreed. If your Lordships permit me I should like to mention them.

1748. I cannot tell what you are going to say till you say it?—We are all agreed that the principle of responsible government should be introduced into the Government of India. There is no difference of opinion on this point anywhere in the whole of India. If we are agreed on any one point more than another, it is the point that there should be responsible government in the Government of India. We are also agreed as to the extent to which that responsible government should be introduced in the Government of India. We all say that the power of certification of the Governor-General should be limited to legislation regarding the Army, Navy, Foreign Affairs, and relations with Ruling Princes and the subject of peace, tranquillity, and the defence of the country.

1749. I take that as your opinion of the views of those bodies?—Yes.

1750. You will pardon me if I myself prefer their own evidence as the first authority?—I take it that you regard it as my own opinion on the question of differences.

1751. Your opinion?—Yes, what I hold to be the common points in regard to all the deputations and in regard to the public opinion in India. Then, regarding the Budget in the Government of India, we are all agreed that we should have control over the Budget except in respect of the subjects that I have just mentioned. Then we are also ageed that half the members of the Executive Council of the Government of India should be Indians. We are all agreed that the President of the Legislative Assembly should be elected. We are also agreed that four-fifths of the Legislative Assembly should be elected, and not two-thirds, as is suggested in Lord Southborough's Report. Coming down to the Provinces, we are all agreed that the status and emoluments of the Ministers should be identical with those of Executive Councillors. We are also agreed that the Government of India should not have greater powers over Ministers than over the Executive Council. We are also agreed that the heads of the Government should be ordinarily selected from the ranks of public men in England. We are also agreed that the largest possible number of subjects should be transferred, and we are agreed that the Muslim compact should be preserved intact. With regard to the Council of India, the opinion is unanimous that it should be abolished. Your Lordship's Committee has heard Mrs. Besant and Mr. Aiyar and Mr. Banerjea and they have all agreed that if possible it should be abolished. These are principally the changes on which we are agreed. The only point on which we disagree is the point relating to Provincial autonomy.

In the Memorandum which we have submitted we have given in the second part the amendments which we propose should be embodied in this Bill. I do not wish to take up the time of the Committee by reading those amendments; I shall be glad to explain any of the amendments if any of the members of the Committee will be pleased to ask me questions upon them. But I must make it clear that those amendments are not amendments from a draftsman's point of view; they are merely suggestions, and if the principle of any amendment is agreed upon it may be put in a proper form.

Then I come to Part 3 of our Memorandum, which deals with our views on the Reports of the Functions and the Franchise Committees. With regard to the recommendations of the Functions Committee, there is one point which I should like to emphasise. As the Committee is very well aware, the recommendations propose to transfer to the popular control, or the so-called popular control, as I should like to put it, one-fourth, roughly speaking, of the Revenue of each Province. The Committee recommends the retention of three-fourths of the Revenue to be administered by the Executive Government in each Province as it is. Now under those circumstances the Report could not certainly come anywhere near to the expectations of the people; but what is more striking is that the Report ignores, in some cases at any rate, the recommendations even of the local Governments. I make myself bold to say it ignores altogether the evidence recorded by the Functions Committee. I know it is a very sweeping statement to make, but, as I will shortly show, that is so. When I say that the Report ignores the recommendation of the Local Governments, I will refer your Lordship's Committee to the recommendation of the Bombay Government. I have not been able to get a copy of the Report of the Bombay Government, and, so far as I understand, it is not even included in the letter of the Government of India, dated 5th March, which is before your Lordship's Committee, and I do not know why it is not included. That Report clearly says that if diarchy is to be introduced all subjects except law, justice and police, and perhaps, if I mistake not, political, should be transferred to the representatives of the people. The Bombay Government is clearly of opinion that the representatives of the people should control all subjects except those that I have mentioned.

Now, if you look at the Functions Committee's Report, they have made no distinction between Province and Province. Bombay is treated as Madras, Madras is treated as the United Provinces, the United Provinces are treated as Assam, so far as the transfer of subjects is concerned except in one respect, namely, Forest, which is very unimportant in Bombay. The subjects transferred in Assam are the subjects transferred practically in Bombay; the subjects transferred in Bombay are the subjects transferred in the United Provinces, and out of the long list of subjects, which are called Provincial subjects, only a few are transferred. I do not understand why the Functions Committee should not have accepted the recommendation of the Local Governments when it chooses to accept the recommendation of the Local Governments in regard to Franchise. I was present when Lord Southborough was examined, and Lord Southborough clearly gave me the impression that he was very anxious to accept as far as possible the recommendations of the Local Governments ments on the question of Franchise. If that were so, why, on so important a matter as the transfer of subjects to the popular representatives, should not the recommendation of the Government of Bombay have been accepted?

I said that the Report ignored the evidence in the case. Well, of course, so far as that is concerned. I speak from my own experience. I gave evidence before the Functions Committee when it met in Bombay, and I know the witnesses—almost all the witnesses—who gave evidence before that Committee. In fact I know the views of all the witnesses, and in fact they told me what they had stated to the Committee. It is very unfortunate that the evidence recorded by the Functions Committee on this most important question—or on any question—is not before this Joint Committee. I am asked to give evidence on the findings of the Functions Committee without having the advantage of reading the evidence which was recorded by the Functions Committee. I cannot understand how it could be, but that is so, that the evidence before the Functions Committee is not before this Joint Committee, and this Joint Committee is asked to say whether the findings of the Committee are correct or incorrect. However that may be, all I know is that in Bombay the view strongly pressed upon the attention of the Joint Committee was that within the limits of reference to the Functions Committee, namely, that their function was to divide the subjects into reserved and transferred, they should transfer all the subjects except law, justice and police to the representatives of the people. That was the unanimous opinion.

1752. According to the information you have received that was the evidence given?—Yes, that was the evidence given according to what the witnesses who gave evidence before the Committee told me.

1753. But you will remember that is second-hand evidence?—Yes, and that was the evidence I gave myself. The fact is that after the Joint Report we had the Provincial Conference, the District Congress Committees, the Provinical Congress Committees and various associations passing resolutions asking the Functions Committee to transfer so many subjects to the representatives of the people.

1754. It is not evidence what you heard somebody else say. Please confine yourself to your own view of what these function should be?—I do not want to say anything hearsay except where I could not help it. Here we have not got the evidence actually recorded by the Functions Committee—that is my great difficulty—otherwise I should have quoted chapter and verse to show that the Report of the Functions Committee is not based on any evidence before them.

1755. That, again, is in your opinion. I cannot accept that as a statement of facts for one moment?—Of course that is so, in the absence of evidence. That is one matter on which I lay great emphasis with regard to the Report of the Functions Committee. The other matters have been briefly touched upon in part 3 of our Memorandum.

Now, coming to the question of Franchise, the Franchise and the Electoral law has been referred to by the Committee as a Provincial subject. It is not mentioned as a transferred subject, but it is mentioned as a Provincial subject. My deputation thinks that unless the Bill provides that the Legislature will have power to make rules in regard to the franchise and elections the mere transferring of that subject to the Province would mean nothing.

1756. You do not mean make rules; you mean amend the law?—They should have power to make the law.

1757. You said to make rules?—I beg your Lordship's pardon. Then I go to Women's Franchise. Now on that question, personally I hold very strong views, and I do not wish to keep back from the Committee that I am a member of the Women's Deputation in England to press the Women's Franchise before this Committee. And your Lordship's Committee will excuse me if I take two or three minutes over this question. It has been generally contended that there has been no very powerful demand on the part of the women of India for the franchise. That is not so. The National Congress which met at Bombay, and the Congress which met at Delhi, have passed resolutions in favour of Women's Franchise, and they were passed not without a demand on the part of the women of India. We were, in fact, flooded with requisitions from different parts of India, and the National Congress had before it the opinions of its affiliated bodies, of the Provincial Congress Committees, and of the Provincial Conferences. Just before the Congress met in Bombay, in 1917, there was a Provincial Conference held at Bajapur, in the Bombay Presidency. Now I happened to be the President of that Bombay Provincial Conference, and I received numerous requisitions from different parts of the Bombay Presidency, from women, asking me to allow the consideration of the subject of Women's Franchise in the Subjects Committee of the Conference. I did so, with the result that the Subjects Committee unanimously agreed to recommend a resolution in favour of Women's Franchise, and the Conference adopted a resolution in accordance with the recommendation of the Subjects Committee. The Madras Provincial Conference, under the presidency of Mrs. Naidu, also passed a similar resolution. Several conferences and Provincial Congress Committees have passed resolutions in favour of Women's Franchise, and it is not true to say that there is no powerful demand on the part of women. Unless they threw bricks, to say that it is not a powerful or vigorous demand is absurd. We shall be forcing the women of India to take up an undesirable agitation if we do not at the start concede them this right. I notice with satisfaction that one of the members of the Committee, Mr. Hogge, is strongly of opinion that we should grant the franchise to women. At the same time my friend, Sir Sankaran Nair, who recently resigned from the Executive Council of the Government of India, is also of the same opinion. In his minute of dissent he clearly states his view on the question.

Coming again to the question of the Presidency of Bombay, of which I know more than of any other Province, I may say that only very recently a resolution was brought in the Bombay Council recommending that women should be made eligible to stand as candidates for municipal elections. Of course, they have been voters for the last forty years, but as yet the seats are not thrown open to them. They cannot be candidates; they cannot sit as members of municipalities. A friend of mine brought forward a resolution of the Bombay Council only last year recommending the Government to amend the Municipal Act so as to enable women of the Bombay Presidency to stand as candidates in the municipalities. That resolution, I am very glad to say, in spite of the opposition of the Government, was carried by a majority, but I am sorry to say it has not been given effect to yet. As I have already stated, women in the Bombay Presidency have been exercising franchise for the last forty years, and, as I told the Franchise Committee in Bombay, I have several times attended the polling stations, and I have seen a number of women coming to the polling stations and voting as we men do. Some people think that there is some such thing as purdah in some parts of India. It is true that there is in some communities in northern India, not in all communities. But because some communities in the northern part of India have the system of purdah, and because those ladies will not exercise their franchise, is that a justification to deprive all the women of India of this right? We have, again, women graduates, we have women Fellows in Bombay, and there is absolutely no justification for imposing this sex disqualification on the women of India. We must start with their co-operation, and in this year of 1919 it is ridiculous to say that half the population of India should go without a vote. So far with regard to sex disqualification mentioned in Lord Southborough's Report.

Now I come to the Franchise generally as proposed by Lord Southborough's Committee. I am of opinion that the Franchise should and could have been made much wider. There is no reason why the property qualification should have been pitched so high. As a matter of fact, the Bombay Government had collected figures of people paying an annual assessment of 16 rupees and of people who earned 250 rupees annually—that made up a million voters in Bombay. There is absolutely no reason why those figures should not have been accepted by

by the Franchise Committee. In the Punjab and in Bombay and in Madras my deputation feels that the recommendations of the Franchise Committee are very unsatisfactory. Take for instance, in the united Provinces the literates are 11 lacs, while voters are 14 lacs, while in the Punjab the literates are 6 lacs and the voters are 2 lacs. One point that I do think this Committee ought to take into consideration is the point regarding the fixing of qualification for voting on the earning capacity of a man. It is said that under the property qualification many people of the working class will come in. I beg to differ. The Franchise as it is based, is on landed property; a person paying so much land revenue to the Government annually is entitled to vote; but somehow or other in India the people do not like to leave their lands so long as they have got lands; they do not go to work outside leaving their land; they will stick to it like anything, and most of the working classes have very little land to talk of. They will not come in under this property qualification at all, and I therefore respectfully submit that you must fix the earning capacity as the basis of qualification. Lord Southborough's Committee thinks it is impracticable, and very difficult to collect figures, but that is not so; that statement I respectfully submit is not correct. The Bombay Government had collected figures of people earning 250 rupees a year for the purposes of that Commttee; where is the difficulty? As a matter of fact, under the Local Boards Act, you have got earning capacity as a qualification already. A person earning 500 rupees a year is entitled to vote, and the registers are ready of persons earning 500 rupees. Where is the difficulty? Again, Lord Southborough's Committee recommends that all persons paying income tax should be entitled to vote. Now, what is the earning on which income tax is assessable in India? A person earning 2,000 rupees a year is liable to assessment for income tax. There is one thing in this connection I should like to bring to the notice of the Committee. At the time Lord Southborough's Committee made its Report, we had this rule that a person earning 1,000 rupees was liable to income tax, but after that Report the Government of India have ruled that the income tax limit should be raised, and they have resolved that a person earning 2,000 rupees annually should be assessed to income tax. So very few people will come under this qualification of earning capacity. So much with regard to Franchise in general.

Then, with regard to recommendations as to some kinds of military service entitling people to vote. The Southborough Committee merely recommends that certain retired military officials should be entitled to vote. Our deputation feels every Sepoy should be given the Franchise. His services in the war, if there is any way to recompense or reward them, this is the one way to do it. I strongly press upon this Committee to consider whether it would not be wise to give votes to the Sepoys. There is an insistent demand in the Punjab in the matter, and it is not politic to ignore that demand. I can see the fear underlying the opposition of the Government of India. They want to keep the military as far apart from politics as possible. But I should think, as human beings, they are entitled to take an interest in the politics of their country, and there is absolutely no reason why we should treat them in the manner in which the Government of India and Lord Southborough's Committee choose to treat them.

With regard to the recommendation as to the constitution of the Council, Lord Southborough's Committee recommends that two-thirds of the Indian Legislative Assembly should be elected members. Our deputation very strongly feels that where there is a Second Chamber the First Chamber should be elected entirely; but at least we suggest that four-fifths of the body should be elected to start with, whether there is a Second Chamber or not. Then as regards indirect election, we say we wholly disapprove of it. We do not at all like it. We say that the election to the Legislative Assembly should be direct. Of course, Lord Southborough's Committee has pointed out certain difficulties in the situation—difficulties as to how to get at a system of direct election. From our point of view we find no difficulty whatever. You have here the electorate for the Provincial Councils ready at hand. All these voters are to vote once, at any rate, in three years for the Provincial Council. Why not then at the same time simultaneously ask them to vote also for the Legislative Assembly? It is very easy; you have not to find another electorate; there is the electorate ready; there are the polling stations and there is the machinery ready. When a man goes to vote for A for the Provincial Council let him also record his vote as to whether B, in his opinion, is fit to sit in the Legislative Assembly. There is no difficulty absolutely. We do not feel any difficulty about it at all, and we strongly feel the election should be direct for the Legislative Assembly. There will be no delay involved in the course suggested by my deputation if it is accepted by this Committee.

Then with regard to the number of seats allotted to communal and special electorates. There I invite attention to page 13 of our Memorandum, point No. 7: "The number of seats allotted to communal and special electorates is more than the necessities of the situation justify. We desire, particularly, to protest against the exaggerated representation proposed to be given to capitalistic and trade interests, chiefly European. We cannot understand why the Calcutta Trades Association, an association of shopkeepers not confined to British subjects, should be entitled to elect two representatives to the Bengal Provincial Council. We do not know what reasonable claim can be advanced for their representation outside the general European electorate. The Bengal Chamber of Commerce is to have four members, "jute interests" two members, and the Indian Mining Association, Indian Tea Association and Tea Planters one member each on the Provincial Council! The absurdity of this is illustrated when it is seen that the people of the Province through their general and communal electorates, representing a population of 45 millions, will return only 78 members, while 11 members will represent foreign trade and capitalistic interests through a handful of commercial and trading firms; while the representation of capitalistic interests in other Provinces, if not on so large a scale, is equally objectionable." That is a position which my deputation considers is intolerable and for which my deputation thinks no parallel exists in any country in the world.

Now I come to the University seats. The franchise is restricted to Fellows of the University. My deputation thinks that the franchise should be extended to all the graduates of the University. In the first place, 80 per cent. of the Fellows are nominated by Government—talking about Bombay, for instance—and only 20 are elected. So the nominated Fellows will naturally elect a member to the Legislative Council on behalf of the University. But, apart from this, consideration there is absolutely no reason why only 100 or 150 people should be given a right to return one member when, as a matter of fact, you have got about 1,000 or 2,000 graduates who can be trusted to exercise their vote properly. They are all graduates of the particular University. They have as much interest in the University as any Fellow has, and there is absolutely no reason why this should be what I call a pocket seat or a pocket borough. All the graduates of the University should be allowed to vote. Lord Southborough's Committee says that this recommendation is not based on any evidence. The fact is, the evidence is against the recommendation that it should be restricted to the Fellows; indeed, the evidence before the Committee is perfectly clear and unambiguous. All press for the claims of graduates to be included in the franchise for the University seat.

Then, coming to landholders, we think that if landholders are to have a special representation a standard of land revenue should be prescribed as entitling them to vote. I find that in Bombay the Sirdars of Gujerat and the Sirdars of the Deccan are entitled to return one member each between them. Now who are these Sirdars? Are they landlords? Who creates Sirdars? It is the Government, who, under some resolution passed by them, have the right to say a particular man is a Sirdar. The Government is not restricted, in the creation of a Sirdar, to the question whether the man holds land or not. If a man is, in the opinion of the Government, a respectable man, and, either from industry, commerce, or from some other source earns a decent amount, the Government can always say, "We create you a Sirdar," and those Sirdars have been specially given the right to return one member under the the guise of a seat to landholders. If this Committee comes to the conclusion that landholders should have a special representation, by all means give it; but fix the qualification that a person paying 500 rupees as Government assessment should be entitled to vote, and should be entitled to stand as a candidate, but not any and every person whom the Government chooses to call Sirdar.

There is one more point on the question of Franchise, and that is the point of dismissal from Government service. We feel that dismissal from Government service should not operate as a disqualification. I am glad to see that I am supported in this view by three members of the Functions Committee—Lord Southborough himself, Mr. Banerjea, and Mr. Sastri. They all feel that dismissal from Government service should not operate as a disqualification. But my deputation goes further, and holds that conviction for an offence should not also operate as a disqualification. A man should not be punished twice for the same offence. If a man has committed an offence and is tried and found guilty, he is punished, and there is an end of the matter. He is punished for it; why should the law impose certain disabilities on a man convicted of an offence and already punished, and who has already suffered for that offence? I do not suppose in this country the conviction for an offence is a disqualification. No doubt Lord Southborough's Committee suggests that the Governor in Council should be allowed to decide whether a person has been guilty of an offence involving moral turpitude, and then he should be disqualified, and not otherwise. Who is to decide? The Governor in Council will decide whether the offence involves moral turpitude or not. But my deputation is clearly of opinion that a man convicted should not be disqualified because of his past conviction.

With regard to residential qualification, we feel that there should be no residential qualification. A man who is a voter in one constituency should be allowed to stand in another constituency, for instance, provided he lives in the Presidency itself. No other residential qualification should be required from him. If the electors choose to elect him as their man no artificial barrier should be erected in their way. They should be left free to choose. As a matter of fact, it is restricting the Franchise itself. You give the Franchise, and you say: "You shall elect such and such a person." That is no Franchise at all. A man must be free to choose what candidates he likes. Lord Southborough's Committee recommends residential qualification only for three Provinces—I understand they are Bombay, Central Provinces, and the Punjab, and for the remaining five Provinces the Committee says no residential qualification is required. I cannot understand why there should be any distinction in this matter between one Province and another. The Punjab Government recommends residential qualification; therefore, Lord Southborough's Committee says, "We accept the Government's recommendation," and because the Madras Government does not insist on residential qualifications, Lord Southborough's Committee says, "All right, we will accept that too." This is a matter on which there should be unanimity in all the Provinces. If there should be a residential qualification it should be for all the Provinces; if there should be none, there should be none for all. So far with regard to these two Reports.

Now I take it that Appendix I. will be part of my evidence, and also Appedix II., wherein I have given important points in which the Bill falls short of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report. I do not know whether your Lordship would like me to explain to this Committee those points.

1758. No, I take it it is quite unnecessary; we quite understand?—If any member wants to know anything about the points which we have suggested I should be glad to explain them in my evidence. When I have put forward those points as points upon which the Bill goes back on the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, I should not be understood to suggest that if the Bill is improved on the lines suggested it will be in the slightest degree acceptable to my deputation.

1759. We quite understand that?—There is one point on which before I close I should like to lay special emphasis. My deputation has asked me strongly to urge to this Committee the desirability of the inclusion of what we call the declaration of right in the Bill now under consideration by the Committee. That Declaration of Right is set out on page 14 of my Memorandum. We say that the Statute to be passed by Parliament should include a Declaration of the Rights of the people of India as British citizens in these terms:—"(a) That all Indian subjects of His Majesty and all the subjects naturalised or resident in India are equal before the law, and there shall be no penal nor administrative law in force in this country, whether substantive or procedural, of a discriminative nature. (b) That no Indian subject of His Majesty shall be liable to suffer in liberty, life, property, or in respect of free speech or writing, or of the right of association, except under sentence by an ordinary Court of Justice and as a result of lawful and open trial. (c) That every Indian subject shall be entitled to bear arms, subject to the purchase of a licence, as in Great Britain, and that the right shall not be taken away save by a sentence of an ordinary Court of Justice. (d) That the Press shall be free, and that no licence or security shall be demanded on the registration of a press or a newspaper. (e) That corporal punishment shall not be inflicted on any Indian subject of His Majesty save under conditions applying equally to all other British subjects." People in India used to believe that our fundamental rights as British subjects have been guaranteed by the Government of India Act, 1915, under Section 65, which curtails the powers of the Indian Legislature in certain respects. We always thought that we were British subjects, and had the elementary rights of British citizenship. But the Government of India thinks otherwise. In recent years they have passed certain laws——

1760. I cannot allow any points about those laws at all. We are not here and we have no authority to consider them, and I can allow no evidence about them?—I bow to your Lordship's ruling. That is the most important point upon which I have very strong feelings, but if your Lordship is not pleased to allow it——

1761. No; that goes on record, but nothing more?—I shall be pleased to answer any question.

1762. I think I will ask you and Mr. Madhava Rao to come back at half-past two. The Committee will now deliberate in private?—(Mr. Madhava Rao.) In connection with the taking of my evidence, I propose to confine myself to Provincial Councils and Provincial administration. I have come here specially at the invitation of the Congress to speak about the working of the electoral system in the Native States, and also the sentiments of the people in my own native district. Your Lordship was kind enough to suggest that if a witness did not like his statement to be made in public you would exclude the public and hear us in camera.

1763. Yes?—(Mr. Madhava Rao.) Though there is nothing to conceal or make a secret of as far as my evidence goes, it may bear upon the relations of the Native States to the paramount power, and so, differing from Mr. Patel, if I am to be cross-examined about the state of things in the Native States and on the statement I am going to make to the Committee, I would like the public to be excluded.

1764. I understand you are prepared to make your supplementary statement in public, but if there are any questions asked by us you would like them to be in private?—Yes.

1765. If you would be good enough to restrict your evidence supplementary to Mr. Patel's within the narrowest compass which is necessary for the purpose we shall be grateful?—That is my object in putting down my thoughts in writing. I am not a public speaker, so I have reduced it to writing, and I shall not take up more than a third or fourth of the time which Mr. Patel has taken.

(The Committee sat in camera.)

(After a short adjournment.)

Mr. Bennett.

1766. (To Mr. Patel.) I see that in answer No. 17 to the question put to you you speak as though you would like to restrict the inquiry of the Parliamentary Commission which is to enquire into the operations of the new system. Is it not the case that for at least thirty years some such Commission as that has been pressed for for by the Progressive Party in India?—We think that no Commission is necessary; but if one is going to be provided for its functions should be limited to the examination of the question whether, instead of in fifteen years the full responsible government should not be conceded to India in ten years. That is the only point to which we want the Commission to be restricted if it is appointed at all.

1767. It is the case, is it not, that for many years the leaders of the Progressive Party in India have pressed periodically for a Commission of Inquiry by Parliament?—Yes; that was some years ago.

1768. Was that not advocated by Mr. Hume and by Sir William Wedderburn for many years?—Yes; that was many years ago.

1769. You have abandoned that. I notice you say here that the Indians themselves should be the judges of the time and measure of the advance to be made. May I interpret that as meaning the sole judges?—I should think so.

1770. You are asking for a large measure—in fact, for the fullest measure of responsibility for the Government of India?—Not the fullest measure at present.

1771. You are asking for the immediate grant of responsible government?—We are asking for a portion of the responsible government in the Government of India, and a substantial portion, too.

1772. Assuming that the Indians themselves are to be the sole judges as to the time and measure of the responsibility, you would leave no responsibility whatever to the Parliament of England?—We want that all necessary safeguards to keep India as part of the British Empire should be provided for.

1773. That is scarcely an answer to my question, which is this: You say that the people of India are to be the sole judges. Now, if that is so, what remains of the responsibilities, which for many years have vested in the Government of this country for the Government of India?—I cannot quite follow.

1774. You say that the people of India should be the sole judges, but if that is so, what remains of the responsibility of the British Parliament?—When the full self-government is granted to India, whether in ten or fifteen years, no other responsibility rests with the British Parliament or the Government as constituted now in India, except such as is necessary for the purpose of keeping India as part of the British Empire.

1775. I do not think you have answered my question, but perhaps that is as near as you will get to it. You speak of "our responsibility," that is the responsibility of the people of India and the responsibility exercised by Parliament; can you find an equation between them?—The responsibility of Parliament and the responsibility of the people?

1776. Yes?—Can I find any equation that is any parallel? The colonies.

1777. No; I do not think you quite realise the question. The responsibility of the people of India which you ask for is the fullest measure of responsibility?—That is so in respect of internal affairs.

1778. What becomes of our responsibility when the full measure of responsibility is given to you?—In proportion as the responsibility is transferred to the people of India the responsibility of Parliament must lessen.

1779. How can it be a question of proportion when you speak of the sole judges as to time and measure being the Indian people?—The sole judges of the measure of advance and the time of advance. We have determined for ourselves that in fifteen years we want self-government.

1780. You try to fit a time at which full responsibility is to be given, but is the time measure the true measure in a problem of that kind? Are there not other considerations except that of time?—So far as India is concerned, I should think there is no other consideration, because we believe that we are fit for responsible Government at once; but for the purpose of facilitating those reforms, as a matter of practical politics, we say let us wait for fifteen years, because, after all, fifteen years is not a long time in the lifetime of a nation, and we should be satisfied if this substantial measure is granted at present and a guarantee is given that in fifteen years we shall have full Dominion responsible government.

1781. Why do you not say five years or any other period than fifteen? Why do you fix a time at all?—We should be very glad to have it at once if you are prepared to give it.

1782. Does no other element enter into the consideration of the problem—efficiency and security? Are we to consider those elements or is it time only?—Those considerations do not arise, because we believe we are fit now.

1783. You admit that Parliament still have a responsibility?—Certainly.

Lord Islington.

1784. You said in your evidence, did you not, that you considered the franchise was too high?—Yes, the limit laid down by Lord Southborough's Committee is too high.

1785. You would like to see a wage-earning qualification?—Yes, or any other qualification of a similar kind.

1786. What amount would you put that at?—150 to 200 rupees a year.

1787. Have you calculated how many more that would add to the electorate?—I think, so far as the Bombay Presidency is concerned, on the basis of 250 rupees annual earning capacity, the voters do not amount to more than 1,000,000, and at present they come to 600,000.

1788. So that it would mean an addition of 400,000 in Bombay?—Yes.

1789. That is all you worked it out to?—Yes.

1790. Supposing this Bill were to pass on its present lines, would you and those you represent undertake to do your best to make it work successfully?—We shall try our best to see how it works, and at the same time we shall agitate for the rest. We are not going to be satisfied with this little thing.

1791. Will your efforts at work exceed your agitation or your agitation exceed your work?—Our efforts will of course be divided; in the first place we shall work, and in the second place we shall go on agitating

Mr. Montagu.

1792. You call it a little thing, Mr. Patel. What exactly do you mean by that?—We say that it is not at all satisfactory; it is highly disappointing that we should be given a few Departments in the Provinces to start with and nothing in the Government of India.

1793. You call that a little thing?—I do.

1794. I have not the least doubt that it is disappointing to you, but you say it is a little thing?—It is little, considering the announcement of the 20th August.

1795. When the Congress and Moslim League scheme was put forward were you a member of the committee that drew that up?—Yes.

1796. Did you ask then for the charge of any Department at all?—No.

1797. Did you ask for any responsibility at all?—We did not ask for any responsibility, but the whole Congress scheme is based on the fundamental principle that the control of the Budget shall be vested in the representatives of the people, and that the legislation also should be under the control of the representatives of the people. If these two things are granted nothing more is required. We also asked that the Indian members in the Executive Council should be elected by the Legislature. Very little remains; our present demands are much more moderate than the Congress League demands.

1798. I simply ask you whether you asked for the control of any Departments?—Not in the way that it is proposed to be given.

1799. And now you are asking for the control——?—Of all the Departments.

1800. You are asking for power to hold up the Government if you wanted to by the control of the purse through the Budget?—Control of the purse and control of legislation.

1801. But you never asked to be able to manage any of the Departments of Government at all?—If that is not management I do not know what management really is.

1802. The management I mean is by direction of the policy. For instance, in the matter of education?—When power is given to control the Government in the matter of the Budget and in the matter of legislation I think

Mr. Montagu—continued.

I think all the desired power is vested in the Legislature, i.e., in the representatives of the people. That is management as I understand it.

1803. You do not appreciate the fact that there is a difference between the control exercised by Parliament and the right to manage a Department?—I do not quite see that.

1804. The right to manage a Department and to choose your own Minister, or rather to dismiss the Minister in charge of a particular Department, is, according to you, a little thing?—As regards the question of the dismissal of a Minister, what is the power given by this Bill?—Under our original Congress League Scheme we could at any time have refused to vote his salary, or, supposing he continued for a term, the next term, we might not elect him. We had ample opportunities to compel a Minister to resign if he did not carry out the wishes of the Legislature.

1805. There is no power in this Bill to compel a Minister to resign?—Not as it is based; the salary is not to be voted.

1806. Where do you find that in the Bill?—There is nothing in the Bill authorising the Legislature to vote his salary to start with, of course.

1807. Are you familiar with the Constitution of the British Government and with the powers of control over them?—To some extent, not quite. I cannot profess to know everything.

1808. I did not ask that. It would be presumptuous on my part to attribute so much knowledge. I asked whether you knew a particular thing. You say, "We are ready for self-government at once"?—Yes.

1809. What would you say was the principal thing upon which self-government depended?—On the capacity to govern, I suppose.

1810. On the capacity of whom to govern?—The people.

1811. Which people?—The Indian people.

1812. Which of the Indian people?—Taken as a whole.

1813. How do people govern as a whole?—By choosing their representatives.

1814. Who chooses them?—The people.

1815. I put it to you it is the electors?—The electors.

1816. Now we have got it. Have you at the present moment an electorate in India?—I say that you could make a very good and a very strong electorate, according to the Southborough Committee, if you draw upon the people who at present vote for representatives in local government matters; but they have not judged from the point of view of the capacity of the people to be fit for choosing representatives.

1817. That is a very searching criticism of the Southborough Committee; but I was asking you if at the present moment there is in existence, apart from anything Lord Southborough recommends as a little thing in the improvement of the electorate—to-day in your Constitution a representative electorate in India?—All I can say is that the people are fit to exercise the vote if it is given to them. If it is not given to them how can they exercise it?

1818. May I ask you to answer my question? Do you agree or not that at the present moment there is not an electorate in India?—There is an electorate; take, for instance, the Bombay Presidency; we have between three and four lakhs of people enjoying the Franchise for the last forty years, both in the local boards and in the municipalities, and they could be readily transferred to the election of the legislature—there is no difficulty.

1819. At the present moment is there in existence an electorate for the Legislative Council?—It is a question of transfer at the moment; there is none there at the present moment, unless you give power to these people to elect.

1820. Do you think, therefore, that if self-government was given to-day to the Province of Bombay there is an electorate ready to dictate its wishes to the Minister?—I think so.

1821. A representative electorate?—Yes; both in the urban and rural areas.

1822. To-day?—Yes.

1823. Did Lord Southborough's recommendation improve that electorate or not?—To some extent.

1824. That improved it?—Yes.

1825. But you are not satisfied with it?—No.

1826. You do not think it goes far enough?—No.

1827. And yet you say that to-day, without Lord Southborough's improvements, there is an electorate which can control?—I should think so.

1828. As you are satisfied with the unimproved electorate in its power to control its ministers if they had them, in pursuance of what you said to Mr. Bennet, would you mind telling me why you choose fifteen years as the time for you to get complete government?—There is no particular merit in choosing fifteen years, but we have considered all the circumstances, and, considering the announcement, we thought it was wise policy just to accept the announcement and demand time limit so that we may not be left in uncertainty and doubt as to the goal, and so that we should know definitely that we should be granted full responsible government in that reasonable period.

1829. There is no importance in the fifteen, and it might just as well have been twelve or thirteen, or twenty?—Yes, or ten, for the matter of that.

1830. You have no view as to a particular thing that is going to happen in fifteen years?—No.

1831. It was just a reasonable period to overcome the unreasonableness of those who were to give you this Constitution?—If you want to put it that way I should have no objection.

1832. Suppose there were in existence people misguided enough to think that an electorate did not exist at the present moment in proper form, would it be rational to fix a time in which to create such an electorate?—Considering that much time is not required in creating such an electorate, I should certainly put down a period, because it is not desirable to leave these things in uncertainty. You must satisfy the aspirations of the people; you can make them feel that here is a guarantee from Parliament that in fifteen years we shall get full responsible government. There is no difficulty in creating the electorate. The material is ready, and the only question is how to organise it or work it up.

1833-4. And you could do that at once?—It is a question of a few months.

1835. You could do it at once whether the electorate in Bombay was 600,000 or 1,000,000?—I go in for universal suffrage, and that should have been the ideal that Lord Southborough's Committee should have had in mind; but, unfortunately, they had not that in mind.

1836. Supposing you were to have universal suffrage to-morrow, how long would it take you in Bombay to make arrangements for dealing with that particular Province?—The question is not to be judged from the point of view of the difficulties there may be in managing the machine and creating the electorates. The question is whether the people are fit to have the right to exercise their Franchise or not. That is the consideration on which this question is to be judged.

1837. In the view you put forward you speak as the accredited representative of the Congress. I understand that the Congress determined what evidence you should give before you left India?—On the lines of the resolutions, and the deputation here met and considered on what points I should give evidence and what I should tell this Committee.

1838. Supposing you were speaking for yourself, have you any views to express as to the imperfections of the present Bill short of the very large demands you have made as the authoritative spokesman of Congress? Supposing, much to your regret, you found you were not going to get everything you have asked for to-day, is there any other alternative improvement in the Bill you can suggest?—I would, if your Lordship permits me, express very strongly the need for reforms in the Central Government, and the transfer of all subjects in all the Provinces except law, justice, and police. Provided, of course, the reforms suggested by the Congress in the Provinces are not going to be granted, and taking it that I am speaking in my personal capacity and not as a representative person, I would say that I strongly urge upon your Lordships' Committee to grant the reforms asked for in the Central Government, and to transfer all the subjects in the Provinces except law, justice, and police. With regard to the Central Government, again, if the reforms suggested by the Congress are not accepted by this Committee, I would ask the Committee to look to our original Congress scheme. There we did not ask for Ministers, as you now propose, in the Provinces. There we asked for the control by the Legislature of the Executive Government both in the matter of finance and in the matter of legislation. Supposing you give us that—that is, half the number of members of the Executive Council to be elected Indians—and supposing you at the same time concede the power of the purse and also provide that in legislation affecting subjects in the portfolios held by the Indian members of the Executive Council the will of the Legislature shall prevail, that is an advance. I would call it an advance, and I would suggest it on my own behalf, and not on behalf of the Congress, as an alternative which would do something, although it would not at all satisfy the people, who, I hold, are entitled to the full Congress demands at once.

1839. Did you expect to find all the recommendations of the Report embodied in the Bill?—No.

1840. In your Memorandum there is a long appendix: "Important points in which the Bill falls short of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report"?—Yes.

1841. Does that appendix contain all the things which you think ought to be in the Bill—at least all the things?—The most important of them ought to be in the Bill—not all. I do not mean to say that everything should form part of the Bill, but in some way or another it is necessary to make it clear to the people that these things will take place. The most important things must find a place in the Statute itself.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

1842. What number of delegates had you at the last Indian Congress?—5,400, including 800 cultivators.

1843. What was the electorate which sent them there?—I believe the whole of British India.

1844. What number of electors went to the poll to elect them?—They do not poll; they hold a meeting and elect delegates. We have got the Congress Provincial Congress Committees, and there are District Congress Committees, and people are entitled to elect delegates in public meeting, so that by these processes people send their representatives to the Indian National Congress, and in that way 5,400 people were elected as delegates to attend the Indian National Congress last year.

1845. You could not give any definite number of the electors?—It must be a very big number.

1846. You have given strong evidence with regard to your desire for further powers than those which have been placed in the Bill. Have you in your mind certain kinds of legislation which you want to carry as soon as the powers are given you?—We think the first thing to do is to introduce free and compulsory education all over the country.

1847. Apart from the principal control, does it occur to you that the form of legislation which you may require assumes rather that you would be checked in carrying measures which you think necessary, and therefore there must be a reconsideration of the powers even if you should find them adequate?—Will you kindly explain?

1848. Is it your view that if you should find your powers adequate to enable you to carry such legislation as you desire yet you would be dissatisfied?—No; if we get powers sufficient to pass what legislation we require we would be satisfied; that is all we want. We want powers to legislate for our own people, and we want the power of the purse; we do not want anything else. The only thing is we have no power to legislate at present, and all those Statutes and legislation that appear on the Statute Book are merely decrees of the bureaucracy. We have no voice whatever; that is the trouble.

1849. My question was designed to bring out this: Your evidence fixes entirely upon what powers you will have—not on whether you will be able to get such legislation as you wish for with the powers that are offered you—that is the point, and what I want to arrive at is—it is the question Lord Islington put to you: Do you intend to spend the next few years in thinking only of the powers you require, and not whether you can get what legislation you wish with the powers offered you. I gathered from your reply to Lord Islington that whatever happens you propose to go on agitating for further powers, even if the powers which are offered to you seem to be sufficient?—They are not sufficient; if we get sufficient powers we shall have no occasion to agitate. We shall agitate to reform ourselves and to organise ourselves for internal reforms, not for the purpose of getting more reforms in the way of powers if we get them as we want now.

1850. You attach very little importance to the subjects which you will require to get settled, but entirely to the powers which are to be given to you; that is your point?—I do not quite understand the point.

1851. The powers are given in order to carry out certain legislation?—Yes.

1852. I am putting it to you that if the legislation you propose can be carried, with the powers offered to you, you would still not be satisfied?—We would be satisfied if the powers we ask for are given.

1853. It is a question entirely of the powers.

Sir J. D. Rees.

1854. Reading and hearing your evidence, I should infer that you thought the system of government in India was bad, and required abolition rather than reform. Is that your real opinion, or is there some party politics in the presentment of the case? Is the system of government in India bad or has it conferred great benefits on the country?—I say it is bad.

1854a. I understood you to admit, in answer to Lord Midleton and Lord Islington, that your own representative character is conjectural; it is not founded on any electorate?—There is an electorate, as I say, in almost every district; there is a District Congress Committee.

1855. I think all the Committee are perfectly familiar with that class of election. If you admit that your position is to that extent conjectural, are you aware that the present authorities make the most minute and widespread inquiries of the opinions of all classes in India before they sanction any legislation?—Not in all cases.

1856. At the time the Anti-Hindu legislation was proposed, like the Malaba Marriage Act and Inter-Caste Marriage Bill, these proposals were always from independent Hindu gentlemen?—You mean non-official members of the Legislative Council.

1857. I mean private Hindu gentlemen and not from the Government of India?—No; they did not proceed from the Government of India, certainly.

1858. Inasmuch as the system of Government in India is a joint system of Provincial Government and Central Government, do you hold that the concession of responsibility to the local Governments leavens the whole lump? Should you hold that it does not in any way liberalise the system of Government of India as a whole?—No; as a whole it does not. Unless reforms are granted in the Government of India, it is nothing.

1859. I would just like to ask a question with reference to a claim you make here in your memorandum, which has been already referred to by Lord Midleton and Sir John Rees regarding the representative character of your Congress. Are we to understand that throughout the length and breadth of India you have public meetings, and representatives are elected by the vote of those meetings?—Yes; you are perfectly right.

1860. There is no other form of election?—There are Committees affiliated to the Congress, Associations affiliated to the Congress. There are so many Associations all over the country affiliated to the Congress; there are District Taluka and Town Congress Committees and Provincial Congress Committees, and all those bodies send up representatives.

1861. You can give us no idea of the numerical strength of the electorate?—I should think it is very large, but I cannot give you the numbers.

1862. You referred to the Home Rule League this morning, and said that really the differences were only on points of detail, and that the only matter of principle on which you disagreed was with regard to diarchy. I take it from that that you do recognise the Home Rule League as the propaganda organiser?—We have recognised two Home Rule Leagues so far, but one has been started only yesterday, and they have not approached us for recognition.

1863. You have expressed a general opinion with regard to having a large and responsible share of the Central Government; but have you got any specific reason which you can give to us why you want that at the present moment?—Without any reform in the centre the responsibility in the Provinces does not mean mean much, and we want that the responsibility which is proposed to be given in the provinces should also be controlled asd guided by the responsible government in the centre. We do not want to leave our provincial affairs, which we handed over to our representatives, to be controlled by the bureaucracy.

1864. You have been asked a few questions this afternoon about this question of the time limit, and I would like to know if you can tell us how this idea of time limit arose and when it arose?—I can tell you that. What happened was this: When the announcement was published in India many people thought that it left us entirely in uncertainty, particularly in view of the observations of the Secretary of State in making his announcement, which I have already referred to in my examination in chief. We thought we did not know where we were, or whether we would under it at all reach the goal of responsible government or not, and therefore, when we met at Calcutta, two months after the announcement was made, the President of that Congress, Mrs. Besant, in her speech, suggested that we should ask the Parliament that a time limit should be fixed in the Bill. After that the matter was discussed thoroughly in the Subjects Committee of that Congress, and there we unanimously resolved that we should ask the Parliament for a time limit. The resolution was moved by my friend, Mr. Banerjea, and supported by my friend, Mr. Jinah, in the open Congress, and it was unanimously resolved by the Congress that we must ask the Parliament for a time limit.

1865 So that really the idea arose after the announcement of August?—That is so.

1866. I have found in your memorandum this extremely interesting declaration of rights. Do you think it is possible that that declaration could come into a bill of the kind we are now considering?—Certainly; there is no difficulty about it. You are giving us a constitution, and the fundamental rights of British citizenship must form part of that constitution Our growth, our national development, is impossible, in view of the recent happenings in India under present conditions, and whatever constitution you give us we will regard it as useless; we will not grow; we will not have national development unless and until you give us the rights of British citizenship. You have no idea of what is happening in India at the present moment; hundreds of people transported for life——

1867. My point is this: You do not think there is a sufficient declaration of rights implicit in the Bill itself without this detailed statement?—No, there is none whatever; no reference to it in the Bill.

1868. With reference to your statement this morning, when you were talking about fiscal autonomy, you rather stressed the point because of the industrial conditions in India. I would like you to be a little more explicit on that point—not at any length. You said that your reason for asking for it was the industrial conditions obtaining. Can you tell us something more explicit?—We want fiscal autonomy because we believe that the absence of fiscal autonomy is the negation of the principle of responsible government altogether. Our industrial regeneration is absolutely impossible without fiscal autonomy. Fiscal autonomy, we consider, is the most essential part of the reforms to be granted to India.

1869. There was a matter raised by one of the earlier witnesses with regard to the Marriage Bill which I believe you introduced?—That is the Inter-Caste Marriage Bill?

1870. Yes. Has there been much opposition to that Bill?—If you compare the opposition with the support, I would say that the support is greater than the opposition. There is no doubt that there is opposition, but let me assure this Committee that such laws, inter-caste marriage laws do exist in several native States, and when they were introduced there there was opposition in the beginning, and afterwards people took it, and there is no reason why this Bill also will not be received by the people as well. It is wrong to say that there is such a strong opposition to the Bill, and we have instances in native States at the present moment where such legislation exists.

1871. There are just one or two points here I would like to ask about, because, as a matter of fact, you relieved me of the necessity of asking many questions I intended to ask by your statement this morning. You say that you are not satisfied with the proposals of the Bill. Could a compromise in any way be effected? You object to diarchy. The suggestion has been made that it might be possible to try diarchy in some Provinces and full responsible government in other Provinces. Do you think that is practicable?—If the Parliament wants to do so it is not at all impracticable. You could very well try full responsible government in the four major Provinces—Bombay and Madras, Bengal and Oude—and you could give many of the transferred subjects to the remaining Provinces; but I want to emphasise that the demands of the country are quite different.

1872. You think a simultaneous experiment with the two systems side by side might be an advantage?—If diarchy is going to be thrust upon us I should certainly say that it is advisable to try diarchy in some Provinces and to try full responsible government in the other Provinces, in order to watch the results of both experiments. There are a good many constitutional lawyers who think that diarchy is impracticable, and that it would create friction, and that it will bring about a hopeless muddle. If you are wanting to go in for it there are very advanced Provinces in India where there is not the slightest question that you could start the full responsible government at once. There is no difficulty whatever, though at the present moment all the Provinces are quite fit.

Lord Sydenham.

1873. In the very important memorandum you have laid before us you say that the Congress to-day represents the overwhelming body of opinion among the people of India. Its constitution and organisation are of the widest democratic kind, and you go on to say: "We speak with an authority which is indisputable." I am afraid I must ask you a few questions about the constitution and procedure of the Congress. A very important meeting was held in Bombay in August last year?—Yes.

1874. Did not a large number of the original members of the Congress absent themselves from that meeting?—A very insignificant number.

1875. But some exceedingly distinguished men amongst them?—Some prominent men.

1876. You say that it was not a split, but only a fissure. A small partition, not a split?—It was not a split at all.

1877. Only some very prominent and, as you say, distinguished members were absent on that occasion. Those members did not set up a separate organisation; the District Committees you told us of did not set up another organisation?—No, these gentlemen joined the Conference.

1878. And they did not set up any machinery?—Not so far as I know. They represent their own personal views, and they do not claim to represent the country—certainly not.

1879. But they were returned, of course?—By whom? They came themselves. They were holding particular views, but they were not representative.

1880. At the previous Congress they were returned?—There was no previous conference.

1881. At the previous conference they arrived as delegates in the ordinary way?—In the previous National Congress, yes, some of them.

1882. And there is nothing to prevent them re-joining the Congress at any time—I am sure they would rejoin.

1883. This having happened, do you say that that Congress held at Bombay represented the overwhelming body of opinion among the people of India?—Excepting the 500 who held a separate view, the whole country supported the Congress.

1884 As a matter of fact that Congress did not even represent the united opinions, the unanimous opinions, of the original body of the Congress?—As I say, excepting the views of those 500 people, the National Congress represented the united opinion of the people of India.

1885. You say that each delegate at this Congress is elected, and I understand from you that they are elected at meetings or conferences in districts or Provinces. They are elected I suppose, by a show of hands at the meeting?—In the ordinary way that elections take place at public meetings.

1886 Are they elections on paper?—If there is any dispute.

1887. There

1887. There is no dispute. The question is, are the gentlemen who are put up for election elected on paper or on a show of hands?—By a show of hands generally.

1888. You have no idea of the number of people who make this election of delegates by a show of hands?—No idea.

1889. But you say it is very large, Those people who are elected do not know what the particular Congress is going to do?—They know very well what the constitution of the Congress is and what its object is.

1890. They do not know on any particular occasion what will be brought before that Congress?—It is discussed in the papers every day as to what questions should come before the Congress; the questions are openly discussed from public platforms and in the public Press everywhere.

1891. What are the conditions of membership which give the right to the vote?—Any man who is of age is entitled to vote; there is no property qualification, and it is a sort of universal suffrage.

1892. There no subscription or anything of the sort?—There is a subscription, but it is very little.

1893. Therefore you know the number of subscribers?—There are hundreds and hundreds of bodies, and how can I tell the number of subscribers?

1894. You have no idea. At the Congress meeting at Bombay, do you know how many people came to Bombay from outside?—I suppose there were about 10,000 visitors and 5,000 delegates.

1895. Did those 5,000 delegates come in proportion to the population of the other Provinces?—No.

1896. Anyone who attends a Congress meeting becomes ipso facto a member of the Congress?—No; he must sign the first article of the Constitution; he must subscribe to the objects of the Congress.

1897. Which are in general terms of course, and the resolutions which come before the Congress are framed in secret. are they not?—No, that is done in the Subjects Committee, which consists of 500 people.

1898. They draw up the subjects?—Yes, they draw up the resolutions.

1899. Who elects the Subjects Committee?—Each Province elects its own members. Each Province is given a certain number of delegates, and the delegates from each Province in the Congress are asked to elect delegates to the Subjects Committee. They meet separately and elect their representatives separately to meet in the Subjects Committee.

1900. And India is proportionally represented by delegates to the Subjects Committee?—Yes, the whole of India.

1901. In due proportion to the population?—Yes, and importance.

Chairman.

1902. The whole of British India?—Yes, of course, the whole of British India.

Lord Sydenham.

1903. Who decides on the speakers?—The Subjects Committee decides who are to speak on the resolutions.

1904. The speakers deliver their speeches, but are not all the speeches, with very rare exceptions, delivered in English?—No, several times in all languages—in Hindi, in Gujerati, Mahratti and in English.

1905. Are all languages represented in the speeches at the Congress?—Yes; there are speakers who speak Mahratti, and speakers who speak Hindi and other languages, and there are speakers who speak in English.

1906. The resolutions are passed by acclamation?—It is put to the vote, and if anyone objects he has his say.

1907. Is every resolution read out in the vernacular?—Very likely.

1908. Is it so?—So far as I know it is.

1909. Always?—Formal resolutions come to be read out. The important resolutions are always translated.

1910. In this Bombay Congress were the resolutions read out in Mahratti, Gujerati, Scindi and Canarese?—I should think they were read out in Hindustani—the principal resolutions on self-government.

1911. I am talking about all important resolutions?—That is the main resolution on self-government; it contains many headings.

1912. There are a good many resolution in the proceedings, and I have read them carefully?—The principal resolution regarding self-government was translated and published in vernacular languages.

1913. In all the four languages of Bombay?—Yes, it was published in all the principal languages in India.

1914. You say published, but was it read out at the Congress?—It was read out in Hindustani.

1915. Not in the four main languages of Bombay?—No, I should not think so.

1916. What guarantee have you that the whole of the audience which passed those resolutions by acclamation understood what they voted for?—The guarantee is that Hindustani is generally understood by all Indians.

1917. I think you are quite wrong there as far as Bombay is concerned?—I have some knowledge of Bombay.

1918. Where do the working classes come in?—They do not come in.

1919. Then you are not democratic, as Mr. Spoor has just asked you, in the organisation?—You mean in the Congress organisation? I am sorry to say that I misunderstood. You say that in the Congress organisation the working classes do not come in? They do come in; there is no difficulty about it. We had 800 cultivators, actually tillers of the soil, the last time as delegates on the Congress.

1920. I know about that. Until the Lucknow Compact was arranged there were no Mahommedan representatives at the Congress at all?—There were several Mahommedans on the Congress.

1921. Before the Compact?—Yes.

1922. Could you be said to represent Mahommedan opinion at all before the Compact?—Yes; several prominent Mahommedans had joined the Congress from the beginning.

1923. Are the Sikhs represented on the Congress as a class?—There are the District Congress Committees, of which they are members, and these committees elect delegates to the Indian National Congress; and in the Punjaub there is almost in every district a Congress Committee, and the Sikhs are residing in the Punjaub, I suppose.

1924. There is a certain number of organised bodies of the non-Brahmin classes of whom we have heard something; are they represented on the Congress?—Any number—I am a non-Brahmin myself.

1925. I know you are. You say that none of those are represented as bodies; they come in as individuals here and there in villages and district committees?—The principal Congress is open to anyone who cares to come in. We also hold public meetings, and Brahmin and non-Brahmin or anybody can come.

1926. They do not come in as organised bodies of their own?—I do not say so.

1927. You have said that India is now ready to have full responsible Government?—I say that.

1928. By full responsible Government I suppose you mean responsible Government as it has been developed in this country after centuries of evolution?—As it is developed in the Colonies.

1929. Which is borrowed from this country. Therefore you are entirely in favour of our form of responsible Government, and you realise that responsible Government differs considerably in some other countries—that is to say, the forms of responsible Government differ?—Yes, they do differ.

1930. You prefer our method?—We prefer our Congress League scheme.

1931. That is borrowed from our own?—No, the Lucknow Congress scheme.

1932. That is another form quite different from ours?—Yes.

1933. I thought you were following our line?—No, we would prefer our own; as we have accepted the announcement we say, "Very well, introduce this form of Government."

1934. Practically you maintain that your Congress system of responsible Government is a separate and new system, different from that which has been evolved in this country after many centuries?—Slightly different.

1935. Do you know any country in the world in the condition India now is which has got full responsible Government?—The Colonies.

1936. Are there fifty different languages in any Colony?—I do not know how many languages there are in the Colonies, but in India one common language, Hindustani, is understood by all, and there is no difficulty.

Chairman.

1937. I should like to ask a question upon that: Do you assert that Hindustani is known all over Southern India?—It is understood.

1938. Is it spoken throughout Southern India?—Well, if a person not knowing the Southern Indian language goes to that part he is always addressed in Hindustani.

1939. Or in English—which?—If we know English we talk in English, but those who do not know English talk in Hindustani. If one does not know Mahratti or Gujerati or any other language he picks up some words of Hindustani, and we talk to him in Hindustani. All the people talk in Hindustani that way.

Lord Sydenham.

1940. Would it not be much simpler to hold your Congress meetings in Hindustani?—I wish that time came; I should like it to come.

(Mr. Patel is directed to withdraw.)

Chairman.

1941. (To Mr. Madhava Rao.) You also come from the National Congress?—Yes.

1942. Which is your own part of India —I am a native of British India, the Madras Presidency, Tanjore District, but I have spent the best part of my life in the service of the Native States, particularly Mysore—three years as Prime Minister of that State, two years and some months in Baroda, and two years in Travancore.

1943. You wish to supplement the evidence given by your colleague?—Yes; in fact, my Lord, my proposal is to confine myself to the subject with which I am familiar—that is, with the administration of the Native States—which has a bearing upon the reform proposals as far as the Provinces are concerned; not that I am unable to give evidence on questions connected with the Government of India or the Secretary of State, but I propose, for simplicity's sake, to confine myself to Provincial government and Provincial autonomy.

1944. Thank you?—Because my experience will enable me to throw light upon the subject of Provincial government. With your Lordship's permission, as I am not accustomed to public speaking, I have jotted down a few notes, and, with the promise not to take up much of the time of the Committee, I will read the notes that I have prepared. In supplementing the answers of Mr. Patel I will first take up the subject of diarchy in the Provinces, and give additional reasons for its unsuitability and for advocating complete autonomy in its place. My arguments are: (1) It is admitted that diarchy is a novel experiment in democratic government, and could only be defended on the ground that the Government has otherwise no means of judging whether the representatives of the people will rightly use the powers proposed to be entrusted to them, and consequently, as a precautionary measure, the official half of the Government is devised and made practically independent of the Legislature, the Civil Service, however, being exhorted, in paragraph 327 of the Joint Report to render every help to the popular half of the Government, and make the Ministerial administration a success. The Bill and the Government of India proposals, on the other hand, make the exercise of any independence of action of the Minister contemplated in the Report difficult, if not impossible, and the subsequent revolt of the Civil Service foredooms the popular half to failure. The scheme of diarchy, under these circumstances, would not take us to the goal laid down in the pronouncement of August 20th, but only lead to further agitation, to be followed by repression, with consequences which one cannot contemplate with equanimity. The Civil Service makes no secret of its hostility to the scheme, and is determined to wreck it.

1945. That is your opinion?—That is my opinion.

1946. I do not accept that as a fact?—It is my personal opinion. The whole scheme of diarchy, which assumes the hearty co-operation of the Civil Service for its success, must be abandoned in the face of the declared unwillingness of the Civil Service to work it. The remedy for this would be to set aside the bureaucracy altogether and run the whole Government with the aid of the popular element. I am speaking of the Provinces. This brings us to the question of the fitness of the popular representatives to undertake this responsibility. I think they can safely be entrusted with that responsibility. The Bombay Council—the non-official members of it—have asked for this measure. The Bombay Government have supported them to a large extent. Madras, in my opinion, is even better fitted to exercise the powers, and after a discussion lasting over two days in the Subjects Committee of the Indian National Congress at Delhi, the Congress resolved that all the eight Provinces were qualified to be granted full autonomy. In this connection I would bring in the case of Mysore, in which I have served for nearly 37 years, both under the old British Commission and under Native Indian rule. The case of Mysore affords very valuable object lessons in regard to many other questions also that have arisen in the course of the discussions connected with the Reform scheme. Before I proceed further, I may say at once that we have no responsible government in the State, but all the machinery necessary for it is there, and if it is decided to adopt the scheme framed for the Provinces in the Congress proposals, it can be introduced without the least difficulty and made to work successfully.

1947. In Mysore?—Yes. But there is not as great or urgent a need for responsible Government in the progressive Native States as in British India, for British India is being ruled by an alien race, who do not understand the needs of the people, and who are yet to give the elements of civilised life to the masses, although they profess to have the welfare of the masses at heart. They do not understand, and are incapable of understanding, the factors of the problem and its right solution. We have in Mysore a Representative Assembly, instituted by the Native Government in the very first year of the Rendition in 1881. This was made entirely elective in 1887, or so. A small property qualification was prescribed for the electors, and graduates of Universities were also given the vote. The result was the return of about 100 members. I have no figures about the voting qualification or qualification for membership. But the point I want to make is that the elective system has yielded excellent results in that it has enabled all communities and all trades, professions and interests to be represented, and there is no complaint of any community being over or under represented or unrepresented altogether. I was District Officer in an important frontier district, when the elective principle was first introduced, and superintended the elections in one of the sub-districts, and can testify to the keen interest taken by all classes in the elections and the intelligent and patriotic spirit in which the elections were conducted. When I was head of the Administration (that is, Prime Minister), thirty years later ——

1948. Is this still Mysore?—Yes. I invariably took the votes of the Assembly on all important questions and decided the cases in accordance with the majority of votes. Mysore is surrounded by British districts, all in the Madras Presidency, except in the north, where it borders on the Bombay Presidency. The people of Mysore, both as regards race, religion, and composition of the population do not differ from the people of the adjoining British districts. Mysore was, for nearly fifty years, under the administration of the British Government, and the system of administration was practically the same as in British India. When there was a movement for handing the State back to native Indian rule we had the same agitation from the Services and from the planting community against the retrocession as we have on the present occasion in regard to the Reform Scheme, and all the arguments put forward by the Indo-British Association against the Montagu-Chelmsford Report were urged at the time. But Lord Salisbury, then Lord Cranborne, committed the Parliament to giving back the country to its legitimate ruler, and it fell to Sir Stafford Northcote to give effect to the decision. The result was that native Indian officers took over the machinery of Government, and have worked it, it will be admitted, not unsatisfactorily. They have made some notable improvements in certain directions, especially in regard to introducing a popular element in the administration. At the time of the rendition most of the British officers either retired or went back to the British Service, and some were watching from over the border in the civil and military station of Bangalore the work of the native administration, and expecting to be recalled when, under native Indian management, there should be a collapse, which was expected to happen every moment by the expropriated officers. The planters who had opposed the retrocession were even better off under native Indian rule than under the British Commission. The gold mines of Kolar, which were not yielding any profits at the time of the rendition, took a turn for the better a few years after the rendition and attracted a large European population, which, like the planters, sends a representative to the Representative Assembly, and has had no reason to complain of the treatment given to it by the native Government. The native Government embarked on industrial schemes of various sorts, and were responsible for harnessing the waterfalls of the Cauvery for generating electrical power—the first enterprise of the kind in all India. English officers—sons of the past Chief Commissioners and Chief Judges — do not object to serve under Indian heads of Departments, and the State also avails itself of the services of European officers who had continued from the time of the rendition, or whose services have been borrowed from the British Indian Government. It will be interesting to the Joint Committee to hear, in view of the trouble made by the Indian Civil Service, that the second Dewan after the rendition was the manager of the Judicial Department under the Commissioner (a British officer) of a Division in Mysore during the time of the British Administration, getting a monthly salary of 200 rupees, and the quondam manager became subsequently Dewan or Prime Minister of the State within 10 or 11 years of his managership, and the Commissioner had retired to his coffee estate in the State, and when a few years later he was offered a Deputy Commissionership he did not hesitate to take it up and serve cheerfully under his former manager. I cite this in view of the fuss the Civil Servants are making about serving under Indian ministers. Under the new scheme what is wanted is that they (that is the Indian Civil Service) should be clearly and firmly told what the policy of the Government is and what the Government expect of them. Here also I must not omit to state that as far as the paramount power and its representatives at the native court were concerned, they watched the native Government with true paternal solicitude, and gave it every help and support, and abstained from interference in its internal affairs. Although the terms of the rendition were extremely stringent, their disinterestedness and active sympathy were always in evidence, and contributed to the success of native rule. This ought to be the attitude of the Indian Government towards the Provincial Governments under the new scheme. Mysore can offer many equally instructive lessons in regard to its contribution for Imperial purposes and Imperial defence, but details on these points will prolong the statement which I want to make as brief as possible. Although the Ruler is a Hindu—that is the Ruler of Mysore—and the vast majority of the population are also Hindus, the interests of the Mohammedans are not overlooked, and it is well known that they enjoy exceptional facilities in regard to education, employment in the public service and consideration for their religion. The best possible feelings prevail between the two communities. During the time of the British Administration each community, Hindu and Mohammedan had been prohibited from passing with music in front of the other's places of worship; but so great was the esteem in which the high priest of the Hindus was held by the Mohammedans all over the State that on the occasion of his passing their mosque in Bangalore some years ago they specially asked the authorities to relax the rule in his case and allow the procession to pass with music. This mutual toleration and respect is noticeable in the States of Travancore and Baroda also. In the latter State, and, as I am told, in other Mahratta native States also, the Maharajah seated on an elephant heads the procession on occasions of Mohammedan religious festivals with the same pomp and state as he does in the case of Hindu festivals. Hyderabad is equally considerate to its Hindu subjects. If left to themselves the different communities would adjust their communal relations to their mutual satisfaction, and none of the difficulties put forward by the opponents of the Reform Scheme would arise. If there are special circumstances in the different Provinces the people would settle them in the way best calculated to secure their common good. I am not aware of communal—by which I mean religious—differences having stood in the way of the exercise of civic or political rights or the working of secular institutions which have the mutual and common benefit of the different communities as their object. On the other hand, the working of the co-operative credit system both in native States and in British India is proof of the two great religious communities in India and the different sections of the Hindu community, including the so-called depressed classes, coming together and acting in concert in regard to them. These societies have been the means of overcoming the feelings of difference which had kept the different sections apart and promoting a feeling of mutual toleration, if not also of respect. The most telling instance was that of the Travancore Popular Assembly when it was first instituted in 1904. The feelings of caste were very strong in that State, and the doctrine of untouchability was carried to its extreme, but when it came to be a question of election to the Popular Assembly, and the election was based upon a property qualification, no feelings of caste interfered with the elections, and the man who commanded the confidence of the electorate was chosen, and took his seat side by side with the other representatives, although in social and religious relations some of the castes would have shunned contact with some of the others. This was the state of things some years ago; but, with the mischievous ideas that are now found here and there in British India, and engineered, as is suspected, by the bureaucracy as a means of counteracting the agitation on the part of the people for home rule, I do not know if a similar demand may not be made in native Indian States if elective representative Assemblies were attempted there for the first time now. The fact is that the greatest enemy and the greatest frustrator of the well-intentioned and generous scheme of the British nation, speaking through its representatives in Parliament, is the Indian Civil Service, otherwise the bureaucracy.

1949. Again, I want to say quite definitely that I am willing to accept that as your expression of opinion?—My expression of opinion. I do not say it with authority, but this is my opinion, the outcome of my experience and observation.

1950. You understand I do not accept it as a fact. Please go on?—Yes; and until it is put down, any attempt to give self-government or responsible government to India must fail. I would begin with a declaration, in addition to the declaration of rights of life, property, and personal freedom asked for by the Congress, that the Indian Civil Service shall cease to be recruited in England from, say, five years from now, and shall thereafter be recruited, after a public examination to be held in India, the duties the Civil Service will have to perform being of the same character as those of the Civil Service in England. Of course, the rights, privileges, and emoluments of the present members of the Civil Service and those to be recruited within the next five years may be protected by Statute. This is the first step to be taken if the existing monopoly, with its vested interests, is to be broken. The English at home have an idea that the whole Government would collapse if the Indian civil servant strikes. This is a mistake. He requires only firm handling. When he goes the people of India will be brought in direct touch with the British nation, which will result in better mutual understanding and mutual benefit.

It is the game of the civil servant to misrepresent the Indian, and make out that he belongs to a backward race and civilisation, and that the service of the civilian is indispensable in keeping the different races and creeds from fighting with each other and for promoting the welfare of the people as a whole. On reading Chapter VI. of the Joint Report, which is headed "The Condition of the Problem," one would imagine that Indian civilisation began with the advent of the English, and the Indians had no culture of their own. The whole thing is in the tone of the White Man's Burden, although the Indian is not quite made out to be half child and half devil. The joint authors have to struggle as best they can in reconciling their conclusions with the adverse facts and arguments to which they have been committed in the presentation of the existing conditions in India. There is not a word said about the culture of the Indians, both Hindus and Mohammedans, about their outlook on life and the problems of existence which have moulded their civilisation and culture. With them literacy plays but a subordinate part, both as regards the discharge of civic duties or exercise of political rights, which, again, have no connection with their socio-religious relations. The civilian cannot understand the character of the loyalty of the Indians and its basis and inspiration. There is no reference in the chapter to the ancient polity of the Hindus, to the deliberate destruction of the spirit of village self-government in what were described by an eminent Anglo-Indian authority as village republics, and the destruction of what remained of the institution after the vicissitudes through which India had passed before the advent of British rule. Then, again, there is the argument that the intellectual classes want to wrest power from the bureaucracy, as if the intellectuals were different from the people at large. The very institution of the National Congress was with the object of ameliorating the condition of the masses. The intellectuals, if they want power, want it to enable them to improve the lot of the people. India, which was once one of the wealthiest countries in the world, is now one of the poorest. Her industries have been reduced to a primitive state, and need scope for full and free development.

1951. Again, of course, I only take that as an expression of opinion?—Yes. The people have not got adequate facilities for education. Sanitation in India is so bad that epidemic diseases, like plague, cholera, influenza are frequent visitors, and carry off millions of the people. The vitality of the Indian people is so low that their average life is only 23 years. If the educated classes want power to be transferred to the representatives of the people it is to enable them to promote the social well being of the people and lift them from the hopeless poverty into which they have sunk. They want to provide means for the labourer and his family to get at least one full meal a day, ensuring for this purpose a minimum wage for the labourer, both agricultural and industrial, to provide facilities for his getting the rudiments of education and to improve the conditions of life. These elementary needs of the masses the bureaucracy has failed to provide, and they can be provided only by the representatives of the people. They will find the means by retrenchment and adjustment of taxation. In any case they will not start with giving improved pay to the already overpaid Civil Service. There is again the stupendous task of building up local self-government, which the Government should have taken up first, but which they have neglected. It may sound as a paradox but is nevertheless true that the bureaucracy is not fitted to undertake this work. They are brought up in the traditions of the system of administration devised by the British Government, and which was mainly based upon the system of the Mogul and Mahratta, and which had for its main object the raising of revenue from the land, which revenue originally represented 90 per cent. of the revenues of the State. The bureaucracy has no conception of the fact that for the uplift of the masses what is required is the strengthening of the economic position of the labourer and giving him if possible a vote. His social position will solve itself if his means of livelihood are assured, and he is given a voice in his own Government. The Civil Service is putting Government on the wrong scent in raising all this outcry about caste and depressed and backward classes. In making this statement your Lordships will understand that I am putting the case for autonomy in the Provinces in as strong a light as possible and bringing reasons or arguments to support my contention. I do not touch the Government of India or the constitution of the Secretary of State, or other questions. I do not appear here as an historian to speak of the benefits the British Government has conferred—that is a different question—or of the services the Civil Service has rendered to the country. By study and also by association and by heredity I am a great admirer of the British character and of the great services which the British Government has rendered to India.

Sir HENRY CRAIK.
Mr. MONTAGU.
Major ORMSBY-GORE.
Sir J. D. REES.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE EARL OF SELBORNE IN THE CHAIR.

DEWAN V. P. MADHAVA RAO, C.I.E., is recalled; and further Examined, as follows:—

Mr. Montagu.

1952. How long did you say yesterday that there had been a representative assembly in Mysore—how many years had it been in existence?—It was started in 1881.

Mr. Montagu—continued.

1953. And there is no responsible government there yet?—No.

1954. Do you anticipate a day when it will come in Mysore?—Yes.

1955. When

1955. When do you think?—I cannot say exactly the time when it will come, but all the materials are there. If it is decided by the authorities to introduce it it can be introduced at any moment.

1956. It has taken at least a minimum of 30 years in Mysore. You adhere, I presume, to the Congress suggestion that there should be a time limit of 15 years in British India?—The two cases are not on a par.

1957. The only other question I want to ask you is this: You spoke about chapter 6 of the Report upon which this Bill is founded?—Yes.

1958. Could you from memory or by reference point to any statement in that chapter which is untrue, in your opinion?—My opinion is that they speak as if the Civil Service had achieved many great things, but it would be more correct to describe the thing as the intentions of the Civil Service rather than as actual achievements. There is a paragraph I remember in the Report.

1959. It is the reference to the Civil Service on which you based your objection to the chapter?—Yes.

1960. Is there anything else?—Nothing else.

1961. You spoke yesterday in very severe terms of the Civil Service?—Yes.

1962. But you qualified that at the end by saying that after expressing your opinion of the dark side of that Service you had not thought it was opportune to mention any of its merits?—No, not in the least. I am fully alive to the merits of the services done by the Civil Service, and I think I can endorse every word of praise that you have bestowed yourself in your speeches and also in the Report of the great work done by the Civil Service. It will be a bright chapter in the history of the British Empire in India, what the British have done for India. But my contention is that they have played their part, and now they should make a bow and retire and prepare to leave the field for popular government. They have overstayed their usefulness. That is my case.

1963. You appreciate the fact that it is not my business to argue with you, but I should just like to tell you that I do not agree with your contention in the least.

Sir Henry Craik.

1964. You have had considerable personal intercourse with civil servants in India, I presume?—Yes.

1965. And it is upon that that you found the allegations you have thought fit to make?—I do not know that I have made any allegations against the civil servants. About their limitations I think I spoke.

1966. "It is the game of the Civil Service to misrepresent the Indians"?—That is as far as this present controversy is concerned.

1967. Do you expect us to accept that statement as a fact?—It is, so far as I am concerned, a fact, based upon conviction.

1968. And intercourse, you say?—Yes.

1969. And you say that the civil servant is determined to do all he can to prevent the success of any reform movement?—Perhaps it is rather stated too broadly.

1970. Would you like me to express the opinion that it is the direct opposite of the truth. You admit that it is stated too broadly. I do not propose to ask you any further question.

Marquess of Crewe.

1971. In Mysore are there any Englishmen employed in the Civil Service?—There are.

1972. Have you found them on the whole satisfactory?—Yes.

1973. Do you think that they have contributed to the remarkable advance which has been made in Mysore of late years?—The civil servants who have been employed by the Indian Government?

1974. The British civil servants of British birth who have been employed by the Durbar in Mysore. Do you think they have been on the whole a useful addition to the Government of Mysore?—Yes. I would not say that they have influenced the efficiency or the character of the Government in any way, but they are in their own way useful.

1975. Do you think they would have got on as well without them?—Yes.

1976. You would be quite content to run the Government without any Europeans at all?—We could do that.

1977. In any capacity?—Yes.

1978. You say that when the British Civil Servant goes the people of India will be brought in direct touch with the British nation. Will you kindly explain what you mean by that, and how it is to occur?—It would be understood that I confine myself to the Provincial Government. Just as in the case of the native State of Mysore, the Government of India watched the Government of Mysore, and guided it in a sympathetic and disinterested spirit, so I expect, when the Provincial Government is practically made a popular Government as understood in the Report, it will be under the guidance of the superior Government, and will be brought in better contact with Parliament and the British nation here.

1979. Your idea is that the Provincial system should go by parallel with that of the more advanced Indian States?—Not parallel; perhaps in some respects it is more efficient, but what I say is to impart a popular character to it.

1980. That would mean, would it not, that the Central Government, the Government of India, would remain very much as it is?—I have not given thought to that subject, and I excluded everything connected with the Government of India or the Secretary of State from my note. I confined myself to what I could say from personal knowledge and from personal observation, and that was to put the Provinces on the same footing as progressive native States, and say that if the Provincial Government are popularised they will promote the happiness of the people and also the masses much better than under the present system. That was the limit I had imposed upon myself, and within those limits I can say confidently that popularising Provincial Governments will conduce to the better administration of the Provinces and also the better promotion of the welfare of the people.

1981. I quite follow that. You said just now that Mysore, in the great advance which it had made, owed something to the advice and protecting hand—I think that was the phrase you used—of the British Government?—Yes.

1982. That was done by the Government of India; it was not done by Parliament, was it?—We do not differentiate between Parliament and the Government of India; we call it the paramount power. That stands out to us as the representative of the British nation and the British Parliament.

1983. Yes, but this active assistance has to be rendered by individuals and those individuals form part of the Government of India?—As I have said, I have not given thought to that question. I look upon it only from an Indian State point of view, and in that connection we look upon the paramount power as a protector and also as a Government watching our interests and representing the British nation and the Parliament here.

1984. You are speaking in quite a general sense. You assume that somehow or other similar guidance will be directed to the Provinces?—Yes.

1985. But you do not attempt to consider precisely how?—No.

Sir J. D. Rees.

1986. I gather from your evidence that you think the Indian civil servant has played a very conspicuous part in the government of the country?—He has.

1987. Perhaps the chief part?—Yes.

1988. And you said, after the public had retired, that the Government of India, consisting chiefly of such civil servants, had rendered great services to India?—Yes.

1989. I ask you how it happens that those civil servants whose loyalty, efficiency, and devotion to the people of India you directly deny, were able to render great service to the country. Can you explain that?—That is in the earlier stages.

1990. The service was good in the earlier stages?—Yes.

1991. The benefits were rendered then?—Yes, up to a certain limit.

1992. They were not always bad, then, the civil servants?—No.

1993. They

1993. They only became bad, when?—When put in that way——

1994. I am an old civil servant. You must kindly answer questions put unless the Chairman thinks they are not properly arising out of your evidence. Your evidence is extremely serious, because I believe no other gentleman will speak as to the native States, with which you and I are both very well acquainted. Will you answer the question: At what stage did the Indian civil servant acquire this new and unfortunate character?—When unrest appeared in the country for the first time. If any point of time is possible you may fix it about 1904.

1995. In your evidence you certainly gave me the impression—I do not know what was the impression on my colleagues—that you thought the Government of India was bad; in fact you condemned it, lock, stock, and barrel.

Chairman.] Put it in the form of a question.

Sir J. D. Rees.

1996. Was your evidence condemnatory of the Government of India when you gave it when the public were sitting in this room yesterday?—I have been explaining that I do not differentiate between the Government of India and the Government of the Provinces?

1997. I did not ask you to do so. I meant the system of the government ruling India. I am not speaking in that technical sense?—The system of government I condemn. It is bad and unsuited to the present conditions of India.

1998. Then after the public had retired did you say, "I am a great admirer of the British character and the great services which the British Government has rendered to India," and, if so, how do you reconcile the statement made in public with the statement made in private to the Committee after the public had retired?—I was not aware of the public having retired.

Chairman.] I think that was an accident, Sir John. The witness continued standing there. He never interrupted his evidence. The public went away because I said that the evidence was closed.

Sir J. D. Rees.] With great respect, my only object was to give him the opportunity of explaining it.

Chairman.] I only wanted you to put the question in a perfectly fair light to him.

Sir J. D. Rees.

1999. (To the Witness.) Can you explain that?—I am still an admirer of the English character and the services that the English Government has done for India.

2000. But you conspicuously failed to give that impression in your examination?—You must remember that one cannot take in everything, as I said all aspects of the question, when one is dealing with a particular matter. My object was to emphasise the necessity for popular government in the Provinces.

2001. I do not think that really answers my question, but I think we had better leave it in the interests of economy of time. Was not the Maharajah you served in Mysore his late Highness Chamarajendra, Woodiar?—Yes.

2002. And the Maharajah of Travancore is his present Highness Rama Varma?—Yes.

2003. In the case of a Dewan who is the chief servant of a Prince, if it is material in your view that the master and the servant should be of one mind, may I ask you if you have any reason to believe those Princes share the views you expressed yesterday of the Indian Civil Service?—That is precisely the reason why I asked, if possible, that such questions bearing upon the relations of the Indian Princes to the paramount power might be reserved for discussion in camera if third parties were to be brought in. I do not speak on behalf of the Maharajahs; I simply give my own opinion.

Chairman.] The witness is quite entitled to say that he is not entitled to speak on behalf of His Highness.

Sir J. D. Rees.

2004. I will leave that. Are you aware that the late Maharajah of Mysore and the present Maharajah of Travancore always exhibited the most affectionate regard to the European officers who serve in their States, and that the latter have always reciprocated that feeling, and have been extremely proud to have the friendship of those Princes?—As much as the Maharajahs themselves I entertain those feelings towards Englishmen and English officers personally.

2005. You spoke of misrepresentation of Indians by the civil servants?—That is during this present controversy.

2006. Then you do not have regard to the writings of Sir Alfred Lyall, Hunter, Taylor, Sleeman, Birdwood, and indeed I might say many others, some of whom Lord Sydenham has quoted?—No. I know the good they have done. We look upon them as the benefactors of the country. I am not referring to those people or the state of things before this controversy arose. Now they have begun to take sides, and the result is that they come in conflict——

2007. I do not wish to cover the ground again. Is it the case that Hindustani is known all over Southern India?—No, not in Southern India. It is entirely a Dravidian country.

2008. What do you see in regard to the rendition of Mysore to condemn the Government of India?—Nothing. On the contrary, it is their title to honour, and to gratitude on the part of the Indian community.

2009. I hope they have it. I will ask only one more question. Do you think that wittingly or unwittingly the evidence you gave here yesterday grievously misrepresents the attitude of the native States towards the Indian Civil Service and the British Government in India?—I was not conscious of it, if it has led you to make such an inference.

2010. Do you think it has that effect?—No, it was not intended by me. I am sorry if it has that effect. On the contrary the sentiments of the Indian States, I think, are those of gratitude to the British Government.

Lord Sydenham.

2011. When you were Dewan at Mysore, after the introduction of the British Press Act in British India, did you yourself introduce a similar Act in Mysore?—I know the object with which this question is put; but unless full facilities are given to me to explain the whole situation, I do not like a question to be put to me in lawyer fashion, and asked to answer yes or no.

Chairman.] I think that is a perfectly fair question.

Lord Sydenham.

2012. Did you or did you not—yes or no?—Yes, I was responsible for introducing the Press Act.

2013. Is that Act in force now?—I believe so.

2014. When you were Dewan of Mysore was Mr. Srinivasa Sastri peremptorily ordered not to deliver an address at Bangalore?—I was not the Dewan then.

2015. Why did you do that?—I do not know the reasons. I was out of office at the time. I was just like any private individual. I think the State officials sent a notice to me. I was to preside at the meeting, and they sent a notice to me through an officer asking me not to preside at the meeting; but as the meeting had been arranged I went to the place and I told the audience that the Government had asked me not to preside on the occasion, and so the meeting could not be held. If my own surmises are of any value I may say we thought this was prohibited at the instance of the British Residency, and that the thing did not originate from the Durbar itself.

2016. Can you say what year that was in?—I am not quite sure. It may be 1911 or 1912, or even 1913.

2017. You say you took no responsibility for this prohibition?—No; I was a private individual residing in Bangalore at that time.

2018. Do you know of any instance where Mr. Srinivasa Sastri was debarred from speaking in British India?—No, I am not aware of it.

2019. Then the action taken in Mysore was more autocratic than the action taken in British India.

Chairman.] I do not think you can put it like that, because there are so many circumstances to be taken into account.

Lord Sydenham.

2020. Then I will not put that question. I understood you to say that in Mysore there was no complaint regarding the over-representation of any one community. Did you say that?—Yes.

2021. Are you aware of the resolution introduced in the Mysore Assembly by Mr. Basavihtra, which demanded communal representation for non-Brahmins?—Yes. There was a motion brought forward, but it was all due to ideas spreading from British India into native States. I have referred to it that it has been productive of mischief as far as native States are concerned.

2022. Then it is not true that there was no complaint, as you stated in your previous evidence?—He made that complaint.

2023. Was not a memorial submitted to the Maharajah by a deputation led by Mr. Basavihtra and other people on behalf of non-Brahmins, including the Mohammedans?—Yes, I was told about it. I was not in the Government at the time. I was told about it, and I have anticipated all that by saying that this is all the result of the factitious agitation set up in British India.

2024. When you were Dewan were the Panchamas excluded from State-aided schools in Mysore?—They were excluded. We did not, in fact, take any notice of it, but this is a thing that happens in the villages themselves, and we do not either exclude or include. We say education is general for all sections of the population. The authorities take notice of the feeling in villages and sub-districts, and they act according to the prevailing sentiment among the people.

2025. Since you retired are you aware that the non-Brahmin Inspector General of Education, Mr. C. R. Reddy, issued instructions to all headmasters of elementary and secondary schools aided by the Government that the depressed classes should be freely admitted?—I am not aware of it.

2026. Then you would not be aware also that a strong protest from the upper castes was immediately forthcoming?—No. As far as Mysore is concerned I have been out of office for the last ten years. Whatever I have come to know must be in my individual capacity. I have been devoting more attention to British India and the politics of my own native district, which is in British India, since my retirement.

2027. Is there a movement called the Varanashram Dharma in Madras?—I do not know. I think it may be general to India.

2028. Is the object of that movement to preserve the ancient system of caste?—Yes, it is.

2029. Did you preside at any of their Conferences?—No.

2030. You say that there is again the stupendous task of building up the local self-government which the Government should have taken up first, but which they have neglected? Have you any personal knowledge whatever of the system of local self-government which has been built up by our Government in India?—Yes, I have some knowledge of it.

2031. Do not you know it a very large, extensive and complicated system, and it has been steadily democratised?—I do not think that much improvement has been effected since the time of Lord Ripon, when it was first introduced. Of course, from time to time the elected element has been introduced, but not progress of any appreciable character or on the lines of what Lord Ripon's minute contemplated.

2032. I am afraid I absolutely disagree with you. I suppose you are aware that great Indian municipalities of India are now entirely in Indian hands?—They are gradually doing it.

2033. Is it a fact that there are large municipalities in India which are entirely in Indian and elected hands?—Within the last one or two years it may be so, but not generally.

2034. You say the Indian Civil Service became bad when the agitation began?—Yes.

2035. Did what you call the present controversy take the form of attacks on the Indian Civil Service?—I do not quite follow the question.

2036. You have said that what you call the present controversy was the starting point of the Indian Civil Service becoming bad. Did part of that controversy take the form of attacks on the Indian Civil Service?—When the Civil Service, for instance, belittled the influence of Indian leaders, and questioned their motives, perhaps there may have been in the papers what you call attacks upon the Civil Service. I should not call it attacks, but attempts to show that the Civil Service had failed in its duty to the people.

2037. I could give you plenty of evidence as to attacks, but your point is that the Civil Service became bad about the time when the attacks upon them began? I should not exactly say "became bad."

2038. I think your word was "bad"?—I think it was put into my mouth by Sir John. With the leave of your Lordship, I would say with regard to improvements in municipalities and towns and villages, my ideas of local self-government are quite different from those on which improvements have been effected under Lord Ripon's scheme. I was thinking of reviving the old village autonomy, the village republics as they used to be called. They are on quite different lines altogether from the Municipal and Local Boards Schemes which the British Government, since the time of Lord Ripon, have had before their minds, and towards which they have been working. My idea goes back to the state of things before the British Government came, that is, what used to be described as village republics, self-contained self-governing bodies where the land was the property of the whole village community, and the Government also was in the hands of the village community?—All that has been destroyed under the revenue system of the British Government. When I spoke of local self-government I had in my mind the revival of the system that prevailed in pre-British times in most parts of India.

Chairman.

2039. May I sum up what you wish to say thus: that you wish to see local self-government developed on eastern and not on western lines?—Precisely.

Major Ormsby-Gore.

2040. You would like any land revenue to be collected from the village community as a whole, and not from individuals of the village. Is that your point?—No. It may be collected from individuals, but I think the revenue of the land and the waste lands—commons as they are called here—both grass lands and woods, should be, as in the old days, under the management of the village community.

2041. I want to turn to the evidence you gave yesterday with regard to the constitution in Mysore. You said: "We have in Mysore a representative Assembly. This was made entirely elective in 1887. A small property qualification was prescribed for electors, and graduates of the universities were also given the vote. The result was the return of about 100 members." Can you tell me roughly how many people in Mysore got the vote—quite roughly?—I cannot.

2042. What proportion of the adult population?—I can only say that the property qualification was sufficiently low to admit of as large a franchise as possible. That is the utmost that I can say now.

2044. When you were in power in that State, what were the powers of that representative elective assembly? Did it vote the local Budget?—No, it did not vote the Budget, but the powers of the representative assembly, as far as its bearing upon the well-being of the country was concerned, were much greater than perhaps you could have under a Legislative Assembly of the kind that is proposed for the Provinces now. Latterly they have been convening the assembly twice a year, but it used to be convened once a year and the elected members used to assemble. Before they came to the assembly they sent in a statement of what they wanted to be done or to be discussed in the assembly three or four months before the meeting of the assembly. When those questions were received they were referred to different Departments of the State and also to the district officers. Their statements upon those questions were received and printed and tabulated in the head office, also the copies copies of the questions and the opinion of the heads of Departments were distributed among the members of the assembly. All the heads of Departments and all the heads of districts met at this assembly, and the Prime Minister read a statement as to the measures adopted; and the financial position of the State, details of the income and expenditure, was read before the assembly. When this opening was over, the statements that had been sent up by the members were taken up one by one and discussed in the full assembly, the opinions of the heads of Departments and district officers were taken, and on such of the matters as could be disposed of by the Dewan replies were given on the spot to these questions, and others which required consideration or the orders of the Maharajah, were reserved. Practically most of the questions that were sent up were disposed of in full assembly after full discussion lasting six or seven days. That is the way in which this assembly worked. As I have said in my statement, during my Dewanship I introduced the system of taking votes and deciding questions on the majority of votes that were given in the assembly. This was my own individual way of working; but it was not in the constitution. But, as I said before, if it is decided to introduce the system of voting or responsible government or representative government, the materials are there, and could be put on at any time.

2045. I gather from you that during your administration you encouraged this elective assembly to vote on all questions of legislation?—No, they were questions of administration. We introduced the Legislative Assembly during my Dewanship. The assembly was on the same lines as the Legislative Councils in British India. They dealt with formal legislation. The Representative Assembly dealt mainly with administrative questions.

2046. Take education. Was education in any way controlled by the Representative Assembly in Mysore, or was that done by the Government on its own responsibility?—Not controlled in the way of its being decided by a majority of votes, but very largely we deferred to the opinion expressed in the assembly, and the Government policy was guided by the opinion that may have been expressed in the assembly.

2047. In a word the assembly was consultative?—Yes, it was.

2048. Can you tell me about your education in Mysore? Your colleague, the representative of the National Congress, said he wanted free compulsory education throughout India at the earliest possible moment. Has there been any attempt to introduce such a system in any of the native states with which you have been connected?—Baroda is well-known for having introduced this free and compulsory system many years ago—ten or twelve years ago.

2049. But in Southern India it has not?—No. There are some movements towards getting it in the municipalities. I am not aware of compulsory education having been adopted as a general measure. But without compulsory education we have, for instance, in Travancore, the most advanced country with regard to education on the voluntary system; and Baroda, of course, is well known as having its compulsory system for the last ten or fifteen years—in Mysore also we have education very much advanced, more advanced than in British India. But there are figures, and I simply say it as a general statement—I have not looked into statistics on this point. I give my general impression.

2050. You have just said that you do not agree with your colleague in the representation of the Congress that Hindustani is known all over Southern India?—No, it is not understood in Southern India. Perhaps in the towns a few of the town population may understand a few words.

2051. Are you in favour of making Hindustani the language of the Congress and the universal language of the Indian people?—Yes; I presided over the All-India single language movement only last year.

2052. And that single language you think should be Hindustani?—Yes.

2053. One other question in regard to your evidence. You say "These elementary needs of the masses the bureaucracy has failed to provide, and they can only be provided by the representatives of the people. They will find the means by retrenchment and adjustment of taxation. In any case they will not start by giving improved pay to the already over-paid civil servant"?—Yes.

2054. Do you say what ranks of Indian civil servants are overpaid at the present moment?—I thought there were some recommendations about increasing the pay and the attractions of the Indian Civil Service. It was in connection with that that I said what we want is not the high pay that is given all round; India, being a poor country, cannot afford to maintain such a highly paid agency. When it is handed over to Indian management their first look-out will be to retrench.

2055. In your opinion, when they get strong power one of their first objects will be to reduce the present scale of salaries throughout the Indian Civil Service?—I should not say the Civil Service in particular, but to reduce the cost of the government.

2056. "The already over-paid civil servant" were your words?—Yes, judged by the capacity of a poor country like India to bear these heavy charges.

2057. Mr. Madhav Rao, you have given us a very interesting account of the development of the experiment in Parliamentary Government in Mysore, but I want you to tell us when it actually began?—In the very first year of the Rendition.

2058. Was it then on an elective basis?—No, not in the beginning.

2060. In the Assembly?—In the Assembly.

2061. But they were nominated by him to take part in the Assembly, were they not?—In the very first year they were nominated.

2062. How long did that period of nomination last?—Four or five years.

2063. Those sanads were cherished, were they not, by the people who received them?—Yes.

2065. What would happen if a resolution were passed by a large majority in the Assembly? Would the Government feel bound to act upon it?—There are difficulties with regard to giving an answer to that, but if I can interpret the feelings of the Government, in which I would include the Maharajah, I would say that they would be quite prepared to grant responsible government to the State.

2067. To use an expression I have frequently heard in the course of these deliberations, the people of Mysore would not be left to be the sole judges as to the fitness of the people for full responsibility in their government; it would not be left to the people, would it?—The conditions differ so much in the Indian States.

Chairman.

2068. I think you can answer Yes or No to that question?—The question is?

2069. Whether it would be left to the people of Mysore to be the sole judges as to the date of the introduction of full responsible government?—No.

2070. It would not?—No.

2071. Then you are not an advocate for the time limit? No one has gone to the Maharajah's Government and said, "At the end of five years or fifteen years we expect full responsible government"?—I have already said that the conditions in the native states, so far as giving responsible government is concerned, are quite different from the conditions in British India.

2072. We may take it that the Maharajah's Government is cautious and gradual in the progress it is making towards self-government; it watches its steps?—No.

2074. Then the British Government is not so unprogressive in setting up the goal of self-government and going cautiously towards that goal?—I think all those demands for fixing a time arise from the people not being quite sure that the responsible government that has been promised by Parliament will be granted to them. It is that which makes them wish to commit the Government to some time limit, and if they were quite sure of it they might act differently. I think another evidence is furnished by the attitude taken up by the Civil Service just now; that is an additional reason for asking for a time limit.

2075. Then the British Government has not done so badly after all, seeing that it has set up the goal of self-government for the people, while the government of a great and progressive State like Mysore has not yet done so?—The conditions are admittedly different. They are an alien Government that does not understand the people. In the native States the Maharajah is of our flesh and blood, and he understands the people, and what we want is that we should have arrangements for hearing the wants of the people so as to be in a position to redress them, and that has been secured in the Representative Assembly. The two things are not on a par. In the Provinces we ask for representative government because it is in the hands of an alien bureaucracy who rule, or practically rule, us from a distance of 6,000 miles.

2076. Under the alien bureaucracy the people have so progressed that they are fit for self-government, whereas under native administration they are not: is that the case you put?—I do not deny the benefits we have derived from the British Government. What I say is that the time has now come when the people think, and it is natural, that after a certain limit of time they should give us self-government. We have outlived the other period, and it is necessary for further progress and, especially, for the progress of the masses, that the government should be in the hands of the representatives of the people themselves.

2077. I take it from what you have said that such a thing as the laying on the table of a Bill and the passing of a Bill does not exist in the Mysore Assembly? It does not pass Bills, does it?—Not the Assembly, but the Legislative Council passes them.

2078. You stated that "the Civil Service makes no secret of its hostility to the scheme, and is determined to wreck it": did you hear Sir James Meston's evidence, and did you hear the evidence of Sir Claude Hill in this room?—No, I was not present when they gave evidence.

2079. Have you read their evidence?—No, nor have I read it; but what I wanted to say was that what we call the White Mutiny in Madras is the revolt of the Civil Service when they said they would not serve under Indian Ministers and they would like to be given the option of retiring when this Ministerial system was introduced. They made no secret of it; their attitude was hostile, and we cannot expect any co-operation from them in working the scheme devised in the Joint Report.

2080. Was not their objection limited to those particular provisions of the scheme which prejudicially affected them? Did they show any desire to wreck the scheme as a whole—that is, the scheme so far as it is intended to enlarge the liberties of the Indian people?—They wanted the scheme to be worked according to their own conceptions of the degree in which the control of the bureaucracy should be relaxed.

2081. You have read the despatch of the 5th March, have you not?—I have read some of it.

2082. Do you find in that any evidence of a disposition to wreck the scheme, because that is a document largely shaped by the members of the Civil Service, which I am afraid you have so unfairly attacked?—I should be sorry if I should be taken to have used too strong expressions with regard to their attitude, but that was the impression produced on my mind. I thought there was no chance of the scheme succeeding in face of the attitude which they had assumed. In fact, they thought that the interests of themselves and the mercantile interests would be jeopardised in the working of the scheme, and they asked for some special instructions to be issued to the Governor to protect them, as if the representatives of the people were going to send them away, and in the course of their retrenchment to affect their interests prejudicially. That is not the way in which they should have viewed the scheme, or the spirit in which they should have received it; on the contrary, they ought to be in a very strong position, and if anybody has need to be protected it is the masses, and it is in their interest that any instructions should have been issued to the Governor, and not for the protection of the interests of the Civil Service or the interests of the commercial community.

2083. There is a passage in your statement which I am sure we should all be very glad to forget, but in justice to the Civil Service I do not think we can. Do you think it quite in accordance with the courtesy which is characteristic of the Indian people to charge a Service, of whom in another part of your statement you speak with admiration, with playing a game, a game which, as you describe it, was a very low game indeed? Are you not disposed to qualify that statement, or would you not withdraw it altogether? Do you think that ought to stand on the record of this Committee?—I will qualify it. Perhaps in trying to put the case as strongly as possible there was a provocation on the other side, and I may have used expressions which perhaps would require qualification; but you must also make allowances for the circumstances.

2084. You have known many members of the Civil Service, I am sure, whose attitude towards the people of India has been sympathetic, who have admired their civilisation and made a study of their art and literature, and have written on these subjects, have you not?—I have.

2085. There have been such men in Madras, surely?—I think Madras is pre-eminently the place where they have done most good to the people, and we cherish the memory of the earlier civilians.

2086. How many members of the Civil Service would you say have blackened the record of the Indian people? Have there not been more who have held them up to admiration? Take, for instance, the Bombay civilian, who studies their poetry and translates the ballads of the Mahrattas. In many cases of that kind men whose whole lives have been immersed in the study of the literature of India have expressed their admiration for the past of India. Is it fair, therefore, to represent the Civil Service as an order of people who blacken the records, so to speak, of the Indian people?—I would explain the whole thing in this way, that I am not dealing with individuals, and, on the contrary, there have been men—in fact, I think, as far as the individuals are concerned, they are unexceptionable, they mean well for the country, they have done great service to the country, but I am speaking of the system.

2087. It is not a matter of system?—It is.

2088. Do you say that there is a systematic depreciation of the Indian people? You say that the game of the Civil servant is to misrepresent the Indian. Now a graver charge could not be brought against the members of a great Service than that they make out that the Indian belongs to a backward race and civilisation. Now many members of the Indian Civil Service have done great service to the Indian people by studying their literature and their history, and interpreting it to the people of the West?—Yes

2089. Against facts of that kind is it fair to speak of the Service as whole as being given to misrepresentation of the Indian?—As I explained before, during the heat of this controversy they have taken sides, and they have not done justice to the Indian culture and Indian civilisation and the spirituality of the Indian, as it were; they have entirely misunderstood it, and they have misrepresented the material aspects of the case. That is my contenton.

2090. I take it that you are anxious very largely to qualify that statement, if not to erase it altogether from

from the records?—I think I would qualify it by saying that during this controversy, since this Reform Scheme was started, they have not done justice to the Indian and the stage of civilisation he has reached and his capacity for self-rule. I think I will go to the extent of saying that the Indian has not been properly represented. Their case was to make out that the Indian was unfit to be entrusted with responsible authority, and that their own rule should continue. That was their line of policy, and in supporting it they have not done justice to the Indian cause. That is all my contention. They never do it. That is the way in which I should be prepared to qualify it. It is only since this present controversy arose that they have not done justice.

2091. There is only one further question I should ask you. You referred to the excellent relations which exist between the Mahommedans and the Hindoos in the Native States. Those relations are not confined to the Native States by any means, are they? As a matter of fact, in the normal state of things the Hindoo and the Mahommedan get on well together, do they not?—Yes.

2092. But when you spoke of what happened in the native States, the excellent relations existing there, had you in mind other conditions—that is, conditions such as these, in which political agitators, in order to show their hostility to the Government, encouraged dissensions between Hindoos and Mahommedans, such dissensions (I think this matter is relevant) as arise when a Hindoo procession passes a mosque?—Yes?

2094. Mr. Madhav Rao, I gather from your evidence to-day and yesterday that all the strong language you used against the Indian Civil Service and against the British system in India is with a view to advocating strenuously to this Committee a popular system of government for the Provinces?—Yes, I think mainly.

2095. That is what you want to impress before this Committee?—Yes.

2096. You want to have, I understand, for the Provinces complete autonomy now?—Yes.

2097. No question of time limit or anything else?—No.

2098. The handing over of all subjects to a popular form of government?—Yes.

2099. I do not gather from your evidence, in reply to certain members of this Committee, that you, on its merits, are in favour of a democratic system of government?—First of all, I think there must be some definition of what a democratic system means.

2100. You can answer the question?—Yes, I am desirous to.

2101. Are you in favour of a democratic system of government?—I do not quite understand what a democratic system of government means.

2102. I assume you understand what system you would like to see introduced into the Provinces?—Yes.

2103. Do you call that a democratic system?—It is a democratic system when there is an elective Legislative Council and the Ministers are responsible to the Council. If that is a democratic government that is exactly what I would recommend for the Provinces.

2104. I do not gather that you would recommend that for the native States?—I am not a free agent with regard to the native states, but I think it is a thing I would recommend for all parts of India, including the native states, if I had any power or influence in the matter. It is good, not only for British India, but for the Indian states also. As far as the Indian states are concerned, I am not a free agent, even in forming an opinion.

2105. But you are giving in this case a great deal of your evidence individually?—Yes, individually.

2106. An individual opinion?—Yes.

2107. You would prefer, therefore, a purely democratic system to the system of Indian autocracy?—Yes, I would.

2108. You said in your statement yesterday that the movement of prosperity began when Mysore established for itself a Representative Assembly?—I do not remember saying that.

2109. You mentioned several things which took place, and I presume that was during the time you were Dewan?—No.

2110. You spoke of the gold mines of Kolar?—I came in very late as Dewan. I was in the service in the subordinate grades for nearly——

2111. I am only alluding to the evidence you gave yesterday. You spoke of the movement of prosperity—the gold mines of Kolar, which were not yielding a profit at the time of the Rendition—and you said that they took a turn for the better; and then you go on to say, "The Native Government embarked on industrial schemes of various sorts, and were responsible for harnessing the waterfalls of the Cauvery for generating electrical power"?—Yes.

2112. Was that all done by Indian administration?—Yes.

2113. And no European engineers or officials were employed in any of these operations?—In fact the Kolar industry was entirely a European enterprise, and for this harnessing of the water power of the Cauvery it was entirely due to the initiative of the then Dewan. The agency employed was American and English, but the project was entirely due to the Dewan for the time being.

2114. So that in the case of both those movements European agency was freely employed?—Yes, freely.

2115. I think you wanted to add something in answer to a question which was put to you by Lord Sydenham about the Press Act in Mysore—you were asked to answer that question by a Yes or No—which was still in existence; do you want to add anything now?—I want to add a great deal.

2116. I hope you will make it short. Will you say what you want to say now?—It is entirely——

2117. I only want that you should have the opportunity of saying what you wished to say before?—I am thankful for your giving me the opportunity, but at the same time there is a certain stage of the question when the action of the Maharajah comes in, and I should like to avoid anything upon that question. As far as I am personally concerned, I was responsible for introducing it, and within a few months I was, in deference to the opinion of the Representative Assembly, prepared to relax it, if not actually to repeal it That is all as far as I am personally concerned that I would like recorded, but the later stages are such as would make it rather delicate for me to explain, because the Maharajah's personality comes in there.

2118. Very well; there are circumstances which have prevented its repeal, I understand?—Yes.

2119. We have heard a great deal about what is called attacks on the Civil Service. May I put it to you that your view is this, that hitherto the Civil Service has controlled the administration; is that your view?—Yes.

2121. And that that has had the effect of stunting the development of the people themselves?—Precisely.

2122. That at an earlier stage the influence of the Civil Service in controlling and directing policy, as well as administration, was all to the good?—To the good—yes.

2123. But its continuance would mean the continued stunting of the people themselves?—Precisely.

2124. Is there any other thing you want to say about the Civil Service, or is that all?—That is all my desire.

Chairman.

2125. Am I right in saying that the population of British India is about 250,000,000?—Yes, about that.

2126. And in the year before the war the Budget was about £70,000,000?—Yes.

2127. Can you name to me any country in the world cheaper run than that?—That is because the taxation was so low? Is that you want me to say?

2128. Taking the proportion of the cost of government to population, can you name me any country in the world that is run so cheaply as that?—I have not studied the figures.

2129. You cannot?—I have not studied the figures, but my whole contention is that as far as the earning power of the people is concerned it is one of the poorest countries in the world.

2130. Is it reasonable to make that aspersion on the Government of India unless you have previously satisfied yourself that there are other Governments being run cheaper, which you have not done?—No, I have not studied that.

2131. You told us just now, and, if I may say so, I was greatly interested in what you said, that you looked for the development of local government in India as a movement which should go on Western lines?—Perhaps it is not quite Eastern; it is Eastern with the improvements which are capable of being effected under Western influence. It is not the old ancient system in entirety that I want to see restored. I want the Indian system as affected by the Western influence, but on the pattern of what we used to have in ancient India—taking in any very good thing or influence that is due to contact with the West.

2134. I did not say British. I said Western?—British is what we understand by Western. We have no other Western constitution except the British with which we are familiar, and when we say Western it is always understood to be British. It is not Eastern, because they have taken the framework as Eastern as far as the present system of government is concerned. It is based on the lines of the old Mogul Government or the Mahratta Government, as I said in my statement; that is, the collection of revenue and the keeping of the peace are the main objects of the duties assigned to what are called the Collectors of India. They are units of government, and, as the name itself implies, it is the collection of revenue which is more their object than promoting the social welfare of the people. What I say is that that was the old Mogul system, and the collector now discharges duties which are not associated with the Lord Lieutenant—or I suppose Préfet is the corresponding officer on the Continent. Neither of those funtionaries exercises the duties which are discharged by the collector. The original name is collector—that is the collector of taxes for the Central Government—and under him were the officers of the police, public works, revenue and other duties.

2135. Has it occurred to you that the whole of the criticism of the Congress which you represent on the Bill in front of you, and the whole of its original contribution to the solution of this problem, is Western in character?—It is Western in character, but we object—we have raised objections to certain parts of it, because it does not carry out the Western conception in its entirety.

2137. If you were to say to me, I am sure with the utmost courtesy, "I think you would be wholly incompetent to act as Dewan of Mysore in the way I did," I should not regard that as an insult; I should regard it is a plain statement of obvious fact?—Yes.

2138. Then why is it an insult if a member of the Civil Service, rightly or wrongly, expresses doubt as to the capacity of an Indian gentleman to rule on Western lines without any previous experience?—I do not think it would be correct to say he wants to rule on Western lines according to Western standards.

2140. But you agree that the expression of the doubt of an Indian gentleman being able to do that without some training and experience is not necessarily an insult?—No, I do not think it is an insult; the only thing is, as I said before, that we distrust the sincerity of the Civil Service and their co-operating really heartily to bring about this result. They have already shown resentment against what is proposed, and in this spirit we fear that the scheme so well conceived and with such good intentions will not be given a fair trial or properly carried into effect. It is owing to that suspicion that we say we should be given complete autonomy in the provinces to start with, and that a time limit should be fixed to full responsible Government in India.

MR. B. G. TILAK is called in; and Examined, as follows:—

Chairman.

2141. Sir, you have come here representing what body?—The Indian Home Rule League.

2142. You have sent in a Memorandum in answer to the questions?—Yes.

The questions and answers are as follows:—

We appear before the Committee as representatives of the Indian Home Rule League, which is senior among all Home Rule Leagues in India. It was founded in April, 1916. It has its head office at Poona with over 100 branches in the various Provinces in India, and about 50,000 members, distributed over all classes of people.

The objects of the Indian Home Rule League are (1) to attain Home Rule or Self-Government within the British Empire by all constitutional means; (2) to educate and organise public opinion in India, the United Kingdom and also elsewhere towards the attainment of the same. It has a perfectly democratic constitution, its membership being open to all men and women of over twenty-one years of age who sign a declaration accepting the objects and the constitution of the league. We may add that the word Home Rule is used and understood in a broad sense without any specific reference to the scheme or schemes of self-government bearing that name in other countries.

Chairman—continued.

This League is an independent organisation; but it has, for the basis of its propaganda work, accepted the proposals of reform formulated by the Indian National Congress in consultation with the All-India Muslim League, the only two great and really representative institutions formed on a democratic basis by the people themselves. We wish specially to emphasise the importance of this agreement between the Hindoo and Mohammedans, as the communities between themselves represent the vast bulk of the Indian people. As remarked by the Government of India in their dispatch, dated April 23, 1919,

Chairman—continued.

1919, "the Congress League Compact is an accomplished fact, and a landmark in Indian politics which we cannot possibly ignore.' It is superfluous to add that under these circumstances the Congress-League proposals alone represent the most complete and the most authoritative opinion of the Indian people as a whole.

With these introductory remarks we proceed to briefly record our answers to the questions drafted by the Joint Select Committee.

1. Do you accept the proposition that it is desirable to bring about the progressive realisation of responsible government in India; and, if so, how do you define the expression "responsible government"? And do you generally accept the proposition contained in the Preamble?—Our League thinks that India is fit for complete self-government even at present, but accepts the proposition that it is desirable to bring about "the progressive realisation of responsible government in India" as a via media between the conflicting views of the people on one hand and the authorities on the other. By responsible government we understand a government in which the Executive is under the control of a fully-elected Legislature in all financial and administrative matters; and in consequence holding office only while it enjoys the confidence of the popular Legislature. The League holds that progressive realisation must be effected in India by as few stages as possible and within a reasonably short period, say fifteen years. It is further of opinion that the time and extent of the successive stages should be in conformity with the self-determination of the people, and that it is not consistent with the Parliamentary announcement of 1917 to leave the Central Government as autocratic as before, even at the beginning.

2. Do you think that the realisation of responsible government in the Provinces involves the establishment in Provincial Legislatures of a substantial elected majority (Clause 6)?—The League thinks that the realisation of responsible government involves the establishment in the Provincial Legislatures of a substantial elective majority to begin with, and a wholly elected Legislature as the final goal.

3. Do you think that the non-official members of the Provincial Legislatures should possess power to control the action and policy of the Executive? Do you think they possess such power at present?—The League is of opinion that the elected "non-official" members of the Provincial Legislatures should possess the power to control the actions and the policy of the Executive. They do not possess the power at present. The policy of merely associating them with the Administration for the purpose of criticism and influence has failed.

4. Do you think that there are certain matters or functions of government in the Provinces in which at present the Provincial Executive must remain responsible to the Secretary of State and Parliament, and must therefore be in a position to enforce its wishes?—We understand the question to mean whether there should be any reserved subjects in the Provinces at present. If so, we do not think that any subject in the Provincial Administration should be reserved. Even then, the Provincial Government will continue to remain responsible to the Government of India, and through the latter to the Secretary of State and the Parliament; and this responsibility can be sufficiently enforced by the general powers of veto and the special powers of proposing special regulations and ordinances.

5. If you accept the propositions stated under questions 1 to 4, do you think that the dual form of government embodied in the Bill is the best means of securing them; if not, what are your objections to that feature of the Bill, and by what other means would you attempt to secure the objects in view?—As the League holds that the Provinces are fit to be, and should be, given responsible government immediately, we disapprove of the dual form of government in the Provinces as proposed in the Bill. The dualism in the Bill introduces unnecessary complications and defeats just expectations of the public; and therefore will fail to evoke the required co-operation of the people, and will delay the final devolution of full responsible government for so long a period as would make the Parliamentary announcement of August 20, 1917, practically nugatory and disappointing.

6. If you have any other method to suggest, does it (i) provide possibilities of advance by stages and facilitate the "progressive realisation of responsible government," and, if it does, in what way (Clauses 2, 3, etc.), and (ii.) does it afford means of judgment (a) to the electors, and (b) to the Statutory Commission which is to examine and report on progress, of the success or failure in results of the control exercised by the Legislature and those who represent it in the Executive?—By progressive realisation we understand progressive realisation in the Government of India as a whole, including the Central as well as the Provincial Governments. Thus interpreted, the Congress proposals, accepted by the League, do provide for the possibilities of advance by stages. Not only is there ample scope for development in the Central Government, but there would still remain certain powers reserved for the Governor of a Province, and these will have to be gradually diminished until the Provincial Governments are made fully autonomous with wholly elected Legislatures, and with as little control by the Central Government as practicable. The Congress scheme affords perhaps greater and more reliable means for judgment, both to the electors and the Statutory Commission, than the scheme embodied in the Bill. For when the Provincial Governments enjoy full responsible government, the data for such judgment would be broader and more trustworthy than under the scheme of divided authority proposed in the Bill, as such dualism is admittedly liable to give rise to friction and embarrassment, which will imperil the success of the experiment.

7. If you consider a dual form of government acceptable in principle, are there any points of detail the modification of which you regard as necessary; if so, what are those points, and what modifications would you suggest?—As we propose the grant of full responsible government to the Provinces, we have no modifications in detail to suggest in the scheme contemplated in the Bill; but ask for the substitution of our proposal in the place of the scheme in the Bill.

8. In particular, do you think (i) that Ministers should hold office "during pleasure,' i.e., should be liable to removal if they are unable to support the action decided upon in their Department by the Governor, or if they fail to retain the confidence of the Legislature (Clause 3 (1)); (ii.) that the Governor should have power to disregard the opinion of his Ministers if he considers that action in accordance with that opinion is inconsistent with the due discharge of his responsibilities (Clause 3 (3)); (iii.) that the Executive Council should in all Provinces normally consist of one official European and one non-official Indian (Clause 4); (iv.) that the Governor should have power to dissolve his Legislative Council (Clause 7 (4))?—Although we propose full responsible government for the Provinces, we are of opinion that (i.) the Governor, as representing the Crown, should have the constitutional power of removing the Minister or Ministers, though the latter will also be responsible to the Legislative Council; (ii.) in emergent cases, especially those connected with peace and tranquillity, the Governor should have the power to disregard the opinion of his Ministers in the same way as he may disregard the opinion of his Executive Councillors under the system now in force (vide Section 50 of the principal Act); (iii.) the League thinks that the Executive Council should not comprise any official members, European or Indian, even in the beginning; (iv.) the League thinks the Governor should have power to dissolve the Legislative Council, with a proviso, however, that the elections for the new Council must take place within three months from the date of dissolution.

9. Referring back to questions 2, 3, and 4, if your answers to the first and third of these are in the affirmative, and if you think that the Legislatures should be given greater powers of control and influence than they possess at present, do you regard the limitations imposed imposed generally by Clause 9 of the Bill upon their financial and legislative powers as (i.) suitable, or as (ii.) unnecessarily severe, or as (iii.) inadequate to safeguard the responsibilities which the Government owes in the last resort to Parliament (Clause 9)?—As the League disapproves of diarchy in the Provinces, and proposes full autonomy instead, any limitations on the financial and other powers of control of the Provincial Legislature, except the usual veto and the emergency powers of the Governor, are, in our opinion, unnecessary and undesirable.

10. In particular (i.) do you think that the Legislature should have power with whatever limitations to vote supplies (Clause 9 (2)); (ii.) do you accept the plan of Grand Committees as the means of giving to the Government the power to secure essential legislation in the event of their failure to carry their propositions in the Council; if so, have you any modifications of detail to suggest; if not, what other method would you suggest to secure the object in view?—(i.) Under our scheme the Legislature must have full power to vote supplies as it thinks fit; (ii.) we do not approve of the plan of the Grand Committees, as we propose full autonomy in the Provinces. But in emergent cases, that is, in cases concerning peace and tranquility, the Governor will have the power of acting on his own responsibility as at present, or he may refer the matter to the Government of India. He will also have the general power of veto. These, in our opinion, will sufficiently safeguard State interests in emergent cases.

11. Do you accept the position adopted in the Bill (Part II.) that the time has not yet come to give the Legislative Assembly a similar measure of control over the Central Government as that given to Provincial Legislative Councils over Provincial Governments?—We do not accept the position adopted in the Bill that the Government of India should be kept autocratic, as at present, and that time has not yet come to give to the Legislative Assembly any control over the Central Government; nor, in our opinion, is such a position consistent with the proper interpretation of the Parliamentary announcement of 1917. We think that the Indian Legislative Assembly should, to begin with, have at least the same power of control over the Central Government as is accorded in the Bill to Provincial Legislatures over the Provincial Governments.

12. Do you agree that it is advisable none the less to provide for a substantial elective majority in the Indian Legislature (Clause 16)?—We think that under any circumstances the Indian Legislative Assembly must have a substantially elected majority, i.e., a majority of not less than four-fifths of the total number. It is the first necessary step for any scheme of reform.

13. Do you accept the plan of a bi-cameral legislature, as arising out of this, as constituting both a satisfactory machine for the ordinary purposes of legislation, and as affording the means to the Governor-General in Council to secure legislation which he regards as essential (Clauses 14, 15 and 16)?—The institution of a Second Chamber in the form of the Council of State introduces complications in the scheme. For if there are to be no transferred subjects in the Government of India a Second Chamber is unnecessary, because the Governor-General in Council can secure his purpose by exercising his powers of veto, or issuing regulations and ordinances whenever necessary without the approval of the Legislative Assembly. In other words, he himself will thus be the Second Chamber. The question of a separate Chamber may rise after the devolution of powers is completed. But in that case it will have to be settled according to the then prevailing public opinion. Even when some subjects are, as proposed by us, transferred to popular control and some reserved for the Government, the desired object can be secured by a far simpler and equally effective method suggested in our answer to the next question.

14. Do you accept the provisions of the Bill as to the course of legislation in the Indian Legislature (Clause 20 (3) and (4); or do you regard them as unnecessarily restrictive on the popular will, or as an inadequate means of ensuring to the Governor-General in Council the discharge of his responsibilities?—We do not approve of the institution of a Second Chamber in the Government of India. We propose that all subjects, except Army, Navy, foreign relations, and relations with Indian princes should be transferred to popular control as suggested in the Congress scheme. This will require certain limitations and safeguards in relation to the reserve subjects; but instead of a Second Chamber, we propose that in such cases the Governor-General should have the power to regard any measure as passed by the Indian Legislature if 40 per cent. of the members of the Legislature vote in its favour. This will constitute a statutory majority. The device is much simpler than, and as efficacious as, a Second Chamber. It lends itself to progressive development by gradually increasing the percentage of the necessary statutory majority. Under our scheme 20 per cent. of the members would be nominated, and these, together with another 20 per cent. from among the elected members will secure for a Government measure the same chances of adoption as in the Council of State at present proposed in the Bill.

15. Do you accept the changes made by the Bill (Clause 21) in the constitution of the Governor-General's Executive Council; if not, what are your reasons, and what modifications would you suggest?—We do not approve of the changes proposed in Clause 21 of the Bill in the constitution of the Governor-General's Executive Council. As we propose, however, the devolution of a substantial share of responsibility in the Central Government, the constitution of the Executive Council will have to be modified. This can be done in two ways:—(1) By adopting the device of appointing Ministers and introducing a kind of dualism on the lines embodied in the Bill for the Provinces. If, however, it is considered undesirable to do so, the proposal of the Congress, made in the year 1916, at Lucknow, may be adopted, viz., (2) That at least half the members of the Executive Council of the Governor-General should be selected from among the elected members of the Legislative Assembly. In our opinion this is less cumbrous and less open to objection than a pronounced dualism by dividing the Executive Council into Councillors and Ministers.

16. Do you think that the development of Provincial autonomy on the one hand, and of self-government in the Provincees on the other, involves any modification of the provisions of Sections 2, 33 and 45 of the Government of India Act (Clause 23)?—The grant of full responsible government to the Provinces and of fiscal independence to the elected Indian Legislature in all matters except Army, Navy, etc., accompanied by a reduction in the power of Central Executive, will require modifications of the provisions of Sections 2, 33 and 45 of the principal Act. But we suggest that the modifications should be made in the light of the proposals made by us above. Care should also be taken that the responsibility of the Government of India to the Secretary of State and the Parliament should not be diminished until a corresponding devolution of power to the people is effected.

17. Do you agree that the gradual realisation of responsible government involves periodical examination of progress by independent authority, and that the provisions of Clause 28 of the Bill are well-designed to afford such examination?—We disapprove of the idea of repeated periodical examinations. As we suggest a statutory limit of 15 years for the full realisation of responsible government in India, only one statutory Commission composed of nominated and elected members after ten years from the introduction of the new scheme would, in our opinion, be sufficient. The main question before such Commission would be to inquire if the time had not then arrived for the grant of full responsible government to India. People desire freedom to develop full responsible government in India in their own way and within as short a period as possible. They think that they are fit and capable of doing so. Therefore the proposed periodical examination will only lead to unnecessary controversies and agitation.

18. Are there any matters which it is proposed in the Bill to deal with by rule which you would suggest should be provided for in the Bill?—We think that important matters, such as the enumeration of the central and provincial subjects, also of the transferred and reserved subjects in the Government of India, the proportion (50 per cent.) of recruitment in India of public services and essential matters relating to the franchise should be provided for by express legislation and not left to rules.

19. Have you any observations to offer on the Reports of Lord Southborough's Committees and of the Committee on the Home Administration of Indian Affairs?—As regards the reports of the Southborough Committee and the Home Administration of Indian Affairs, we agree with the suggestions made by the Congress. In our opinion women possessing the necessary qualifications should not be excluded from the franchise, and that property qualification should be so low as to include the working classes in the electorate. We also think that elections to the Indian Legislative Assembly should be direct. The Council of the Secretary of State for India should be abolished, there should be at least one Indian Under-Secretary, and fiscal autonomy should be granted to India.

Declaration Rights.—Lastly, we venture to point out that any reforms or schemes of reforms would be practically useless unless the people are secure in the possession of the elementary rights of citizenship, viz., the freedom of person, speech and association, as well as the freedom of the Press. We therefore strongly urge the inclusion of the declaration of rights, as proposed by the Congress, in the new Bill.

Summary.—To sum up, we propose:—(i.) The grant of full responsible government to the Provinces, with safeguards of veto, reference to Government of India, and certain emergency powers to the Governor. (ii.) In the Central Government we want all subjects other than Army, Navy, foreign affairs, relations with Indian chiefs, and questions of peace and tranquillity and the defence of the country, transferred to the popular control. There should be no Second Chamber, but only an artificial majority created by Statute for reserved subjects. Instead of dualism in the Executive Council, the arrangement suggested by the Lucknow Congress should be adopted. (iii.) Fiscal autonomy for India. (iv.) The Bill should include a Declaration of Rights. (v.) A statutory limit within which the devolution should be completed. Unless the Bill is broadened on these lines it cannot, even as a first step, satisfy the people and permanently restore peace and contentment in the land. It is desirable that the energies of the people should be directed to constructive work, and not to criticism and agitation.

2143. Do you wish to make any statement supplementary to that Memorandum?—Yes The answers are very brief, and some of the statements in them require some explanation in order to make them clear, and I wish to say a few words. There are about eight or nine points connected with it. The first thing which I want to explain is that we accept the policy laid down in the announcement of the 20th August, 1917. By that I do not mean the whole announcement, but only the policy laid down in that announcement, and as it is interpreted by the Congress in its resolutions. As I understand it, the announcement is made up of three parts; first, the policy of the Government; secondly, what action the Cabinet took upon it; and, thirdly, the views of the Secretary of State and the Government of India in relation thereto. The first part is what is quoted in the Preamble to the Bill, the policy itself. So far as I can see from the report of the War Cabinet, when they refer to the policy, they only refer to the first part of it, and not to the other two parts. That policy we accept, and that is the gradual development of responsible government in India. As I stated in my answers, I accept that as a via media between the popular view on the one hand and the view of the authorities on the other. We hold that India is fit for responsible government—that is the second point—at present, immediately. Now, with regard to responsible government there is some difference of opinion which requires to be cleared up. When we say "responsible government" we sometimes lay stress on the word "responsible" and sometimes on the word "government," but never on the two together. What I think is—or what my League thinks is—that responsible government involves two questions, firstly, capacity to govern, and, secondly, the responsibility of the Ministers to either the people or their representatives in the Legislative Assemby. With regard to the first part of it, laying stress on the word "government," we hold that India is capable of governing itself. The only question with regard to responsible government in that sense is whether the Ministers or the Executive should hold office while they enjoy the confidence of the Legislative Assembly. Now, in that connection it is true that the electorate is not now ready, but it cannot be ready until the responsible government is decided upon. The two depend on each other, getting the electorate ready and responsible government; for instance, when the scheme of local self-government was introduced in 1884, an electorate was created and a kind of local self-government was introduced at the same time. Our contention is that there are ample materials for the electorate in the country; for instance, the method by which the members of Provincial Legislative Councils are elected. It is not on as broad a Franchise as we wish, but there are materials in the country and they could be worked up and we could get a fairly good electorate to begin with, to be expanded in course of time, and in that sense we hold that India is fit for responsible government immediately. But as a compromise we accept the position that this responsible government should be gradually introduced in India. There is a further difficulty, however, namely, who is to interpret the word "gradually." The word "gradually" means in different stages, and the stages may be few or many, and the time distance between the two stages may be much shorter than what some people think. There are those two questions as regards the stages—how many stages there should be, and what should be the time distance between those stages? Those are questions which I may say different people answer in different ways. The opinion of our League and of the Congress is that there should be as few stages as possible, and that there should be a certain time limit when the devolution should be completed. Without that time limit it is not possible to work out the scheme satisfactorily. It would not create that confidence, it would not attract that kind of co-operation which is essential for the success of the scheme. That is why a time limit has been introduced. Of course, there is no charm in the figure 15 I admit; it is an illustrative figure, according to my contention, introduced into the Congress resolution. Five years more or less does not matter in a nation's life; it might be 10 or 20, but we have named a figure, and that figure has been stated to be 15 years, which figure was accepted unanimously in the Congress at Bombay. The earlier wording was "as early as possible," but that wording was changed in Bombay to "15 years." Now that is what I have to say about the meaning of the words "responsible government," and also the two different views which are taken in different spheres about it. As to the view of our League, which is an independent League, we have, as the basis of our work, adopted the Congress resolution and scheme to begin with as a first substantial step.

So much with regard to those three points—what the first step should be, what the rate of progress should be, and within what limit it should be completed, our views are those which I have stated before your Lordship now. As regards the stages, we expect that when we have been granted responsible government, it should be a scheme which should be completed as early or during as short a period as possible. To extend the scheme over 100 years or a century or two means nothing. It cannot evoke any enthusiasm for the scheme, and it cannot secure that co-operation of the people which is contemplated in the Joint Report. Then I have something to say about diarchy. Diarchy, of course, it is admitted, is only a transitional system, not a scientifically perfect system. It is adopted as a necessary evil when you have to divide functions, and when you cannot grant responsible government as a whole at once. Some devolution of functions is quite necessary, and then the only care which should be taken about it is to see that the system devised is not so complicated, is not so embarassing as to mar or imperil the success of the scheme. We do not oppose diarchy altogether, but we should like to have as little of diarchy as possible. On that basis the Congress League scheme provides that there shall be full Provincial autonomy. Provincial autonomy is again a phrase which is used with a double meaning. First, Provincial autonomy as between the Provincial Government and the Government of India. That is not the meaning attached to it in the Congress programme. Provincial autonomy means that there should be no reserved subjects in the Provinces, to speak in the language of the Bill. Now we say that the Provinces are fit to be entrusted with full responsible government, and ought to be entrusted with full responsible government in the begining, and as regards the Government of India the control should be secured to the popular elected Legislative Assembly, at least in those departments which are Provincial as opposed to Central. Then only you can have continuous popular control from the lowest grade up to the highest, so that those Departments which are transferred or which will be transferred in the Provinces—I mean the policy with regard to those Departments—would be laid down in the Imperial Legislative Assembly, and the Ministers selected by that Assembly. Otherwise it cannot work. The Provincial autonomy—that is, full responsibility in the Provinces—cannot work unless the control at the centre is secured to the popular Legislative Assembly. So we propose full Provincial autonomy in the Provinces, and in the Central Government a kind of dualism, but not quite diarchy of the kind that is proposed in the Bill. I have stated that in my reply to Question No. 15: "For the Central Government we might adopt the same method which is now provided for in the Provinces, or we might adopt an alternative scheme of having half the Executive selected from amongst the elected members of the Legislative Assembly." That is the old Congress scheme. But when the Report was published that scheme was revised in the light of the Report, and the new Congress scheme is now before you.

I wish to explain another point about this time limit. We think it essential, because it will secure sympathy and confidence from the people, which is some protection. As we know from the history of the Administration, the real reason for fixing that time limit is to create confidence that something will be done during a definite period of time, and that people may be assured that if they successfully worked out the scheme they will get full responsible government during fifteen years. Without that time limit we know as a matter of fact that promises may be delayed much longer than what the people expect. There are certain promises, for instance, in the Royal Proclamation of 1858 which have not yet been fulfilled. That being the case, we want a scheme which will work automatically, and which will be completed in a definite period.

Another point to which I would refer is that we disapprove of the Council of State, a Second Chamber in the Government of India. Supposing the Government of India is to remain as autocratic as before, I do not think a Second Chamber is a necessity; but if certain subjects are to be transferred, and some are to be reserved, then there ought to be some machinery by which the necessary legislation on a reserved subject may be secured. That machinery we propose—the Congress resolution proposes it, and I believe it is supported by one of the Provincial Governments—would create an artificial majority for the case, say, 40 per cent. of the members voting. The Legislative Assembly will consist, according to our scheme, of 80 per cent. elected members and 20 per cent. nominated members, so that if 20 per cent. out of the elected members vote for a particular measure, it means that it is passed in a Council equally divided between nominated and elected members, and in that case the Government should be authorised to consider that measure as passed, in spite of the fact that it is not approved by the whole Legislative Assembly or by the majority of the Legislative Assembly. This scheme also lends itself to gradual development. You can increase the 40 per cent. (there is between 40 and 50 a margin of 10) by annual increments or increments which are definitely introduced after a certain period. This scheme equally lends itself to gradual development. That is what is proposed. This scheme proposed by us in our answers, in my opinion, meets all the requirements of the case. Besides, it is much simpler to work with; it avoids all the complications of a Second Chamber, and provides for the necessary safeguards. That is with regard to the Central Government.

Now, there are certain minor questions connected with the voting, franchise, and so on. But these I shall take up last. Another important matter is fiscal autonomy. I do not think that any scheme of responsible government can work unless the Legislative Assembly has full control over the finances and control over the Executive. At present the position is this: that full financial control rests with the Secretary of State and his Council. The Government of India must obtain the previous sanction of the Secretary of State in order to introduce any financial measure in the Legislative Assembly; and then, further, no elected member of the Legislative Assembly can introduce any financial measure in the Council without the previous sanction of the Government of India, and that sanction cannot be given without consulting the Secretary of State. The present position is that no members of the Imperial Legislative Council can introduce any financial measure—any measure affecting revenues, taxes, customs, and so on—without the previous sanction of the Governor-General. That being so, supposing more expenditure is required on a particular department, and that that expenditure is made necessary, the whole machinery will have to be moved, sanction having to be obtained from the Government of India, and the Government of India having to obtain the previous sanction of the Secretary of State otherwise the Minister or the Councillor in charge of the Department will not find the requisite funds for the purpose. That is what is meant by fiscal or financial autonomy The Legislative Council must have the power of introducing any financial measure in the country and having it passed there by a majority, and if that measure is found inconvenient or unnecessary by the Government the Governor will have his power of veto to exercise. The present proposals are such that in cases where the Government of India and the Legislative Council agree, then the Secretary of State could not veto the measure, but although the Government of India and the Legislative Council agree, it is quite necessary that the Legislative Council should have the power of independently introducing a financial measure in the Imperial Legislative Council, and to see that it passes there, and then the veto to be exercised may be with the consent of the Secretary of State.

The next point on which I wish to say a few words of explanation is the necessity of including in the Bill the Declaration of Right suggested by the Congress. I do not wish to go at length into the merits of the case, but I simply want to point out that without such a provision the growth of self-government cannot be in any way adequate to our expectations. Self-government cannot grow in a soil like the present, and for that reason it is necessary to have the Declaration of Rights. They are the elementary rights of citizenship. We thought they were included in the older Statute, but it should be made clear now. Without free discussion of these different subjects in the Press and on the platform it is impossible to effect any real progress. It is one of the necessary things. I do not wish to say more about it; it has been urged in the Congress scheme, and I have said what I have to say about the statutory limit.

Then there are two or three points as regards the franchise and voting. First we support the extension of the franchise to include women in the franchise, furnishing the same qualifications; secondly, as stated in my answer to No. 19: "In our opinion women furnishing the necessary qualifications should not be excluded from the franchise, and the property qualification should be so low as to include the working classes in the electorate." Then another point which my League wishes to impress upon the Committee is, that the election to the Imperial Legislative Council should be direct. I do not think there is much difficulty about that. The electorate already exists in the Provinces, and the same electorate might be utilised for electing members of the Imperial Legislative Council. As regards provincial autonomy, I have only one more observation to make, viz., that we consider that full responsible government should be granted to the Provinces, not because the present scheme involves diarchy, but because the Provinces are fit for it, and that it is a natural step. There are the three distinct parts, the Government of India, the Provincial Government, and the Local Self-Government. Now, first the Local Self-Government comes into the Provinces, and then the natural step always is to grant full responsible government to the Provinces, and then only we can get to know whether the experiment is a success or not. It would provide better data for judgment both by the public and by the authorities, or by the Commission. It would give to the people something they can manage, in which nobody else will interfere, and then alone we can properly judge whether the people are capable or not capable, or whether they have the necessary capacity and experience to carry on this responsible government.

Those are the few observations I have to make in explanation of the answers which have been already handed over. If any further explanation is necessary I shall be glad to give it. There is one request I have to make, however, my Lord, and that is that I am rather hard of hearing, and if I do not hear any of the questions they may be inadequately answered.

(The Witness is directed to withdraw.)

(After a short adjournment.)

Mrs. SAROJINI NAIDU, is called in; and Examined as follows:—

Chairman.

2144. You do not come here representing any particular organisation, I think, but as speaking for the women of India from a general public experience?—That would be the correct way to express my position in this matter, though I did come originally on the Home Rule League as a member of the deputation, but as I thought it better to concentrate on this one point, and make it my chief work in England, I preferred to be out of the deputation as a member and to give evidence on behalf of the women of India on this question.

2145. You have been good enough to put in a Memorandum[2] which, if you will allow me to say so, relieves our prosaic literature with a poetic touch, and with that, and with the evidence already put in by witnesses hitherto, we are very fairly in possession of the case in respect to Indian women, but if you desire to say anything in addition, and talk to us on the subject we shall be pleased to hear you?—I felt that in making this little Memorandum, being a partisan of my own cause, it might be possible, as your Lordship says, to add a poetic touch to a very prosaic question, and that is why I took the trouble, very unusual with me, of consulting statistics, because I thought that statistics, in support of rhetoric, might appeal a little bit more than words by themselves. I do not want to exaggerate for a single moment the position of Indian women as it stands to-day. I do not want to pretend that, even as statistics go, they are so extraordinarily in our favour, but I do wish to say this, that if I demand a franchise on the same qualifications as the men, it is because I think that of the 5½ millions to whom Lord Southborough's Committee is prepared to give the franchise, at least one-fifth would be women, whether it be a literacy or a property qualification. It is argued by those that are opposed to us that it would be very novel and very offensive, or alarming to conservative tradition, but might I, without being accused of being egotistical, speak of my own experience in this regard both as regards Hindu and Mussulman orthodoxy? I want to be taken merely as a symbol of Indian women, and not as speaking of myself in any personal capacity. So far from offending any orthodox feeling. the idea of women coming forward has been welcomed even in the most conservative cities in India. There could be no greater centre of orthodox Hindu feeling, unbroken for centuries, than in the city of Conjevaram. It is a great cathedral town where I had the honour to be President of the Madras Provincial Conference last year. So far from causing any offence to the priests, who are the monarchs practically of that city, I was honoured by a public procession, into which the temple horse and the temple elephant, and the temple standard were brought, and the priests themselves took a leading part in the pageant of welcome. That is Conjevaram, in the south. In Benares, when I went to perform certain religious ceremonies, though the priests of the temples and though the men who were supposed to be the custodians of all religious conventions in India knew very well that I had been in Europe, and that I did not live an orthodox life in the Hindu sense of the word, and that usually in the course of my long tours through India I preferred to stay with Mussulman friends whenever I had their hospitality offered to me, they gave me the greatest welcome, and they said that unless Hindu women began to take their rightful part again in public life—in the national life—there could be no progress. When I went to the Gurukul at Haidwar, an almost monastic institution for young men, for the first time in the history of that institution, I, a woman, was allowed to enter the Holy of Holies and speak to the students there on behalf of women in national life, the mission of women in uplifting national life, and also the power of women to refine and enlarge and sustain the ideals for which these men were being trained. That is so far as Hindu conventional orthodoxy goes.

Now, as regards Mussulmans, it might seem strange to you, because you have heard it said often that there is great bitterness between Hindus and Mussulmans, and if that is so, when they have to deal with men, by whose side they live and play and share the national troubles and national aspirations, it ought to be more so as regards women. But if one takes Aligarh as the centre of the modern Islamic aspiration and culture, I would like to say that perhaps in no Hindu community and in no Hindu centre have I ever received such a cordial welcome as from the trustees and the students of this college, which is the expression of the modern Islamic feeling, intellectual and religious. I have had the honour of being entertained by the trustees themselves, some of them representing the old conventional, almost fanatical, Islamic feeling. So far as Aligarh goes you may say it is modern, but I have had the great privilege of addressing on very important questions, political bodies like the Moslem League, not only in the year 1913, when there might have been some point in having a Hindu man or woman address them, when they were reorganising their political constitution, and for the first time expressing their desire to co-operate with the Hindu community and other communities, but every succeeding year, and especially last year, in Delhi, when the Moslem League might be said to have taken on an almost purely Islamic aspect rather than a political aspect, when for the first time in the history of Mussulman political progress the Mulvies—that is, the leading learned men who guard Islam, order excommunications, and who practically have an index, like the Vatican, of all books which are too progressive, and so on—took a leading part, I think I happened to be the only Hindu who spoke, and always at these gatherings I have spoken of Hindu-Moslem unity. I am not speaking only of myself, but all women who have come forward and taken a very active part in solving this question. On the question of reform, of all points which might be put forward I think the Hindu-Moslem problem is the pivot on which the whole future of political life depends, and I think the part of Indian women is to solve that. They solve it in more ways than one, because the social relation between the Hindu women and the Mussulman women is so extraordinarily cordial that I know of an instance in my own city of Hyderabad, which is to-day the premier premier Moslem city in India, where a Hindu woman —one who was born in far-off Bengal, one who never to the end of her days learned even to speak correctly the Urdu language—became the centre of that Moslem life. She had never heard of social reform, and never heard of political problems and Hindu Moslem differences; but in the course of time she became so much the centre of that Moslem life that her face was the first shown to the Moslem bride, and the new-born Moslem babes were put into her arms; and when she died, a Hindu widow who had never heard of political problems, she had helped to solve them, because, by my permission, readily granted because it was an honour, her bier was carried to the burning-ghat by the sons and grandsons of Mussulmans whom she had counselled and helped. She was my mother. Now in Moslem ladies' conferences, as in all their social gatherings, a very honoured place is given to Hindu women, because, though it may sound strange, since women are always supposed to be more conservative in those ways than men, there is never any question raised as to whether you are a Mussulman or a Parsee or Hindu woman—but you are a woman; and the solidarity of the women in India is so great that if the franchise is given, if a recognised official status is given to that solidarity among Indian women, I think that any reform, however large, however magnanimous, can be worthily sustained, because all reforms are based on the united co-operation of all the sections of the Indian community. I feel the franchise being given to women would guarantee this co-operation. Also it is said—I think Lord Southborough said so, and Sir James Meston, and one or two others —that no very large agitation was carried on with regard to this franchise question. But if I may say so, with all courtesy, Sir James Meston, Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces, is not in a position to come intimately into contact with the social feeling of my people. No big official will ever come into contact, excepting officially, with any section of Indian feeling. When the historic announcement of the 20th August came, and when, from end to end India was stirred by the feeling of hope that this announcement really foreshadowed very substantial reforms, the women began to feel, why should they not, having taken such a large part all those years in all the movements, social, political, educational and industrial, that were going on in India, why should not they claim their share? The word "franchise" was a new word to us and to our men. When we were making all this agitation the word franchise never came in as a word, but when the word franchise was heard the idea came to certain women, of the Women's University to start with, and I must say in this they were greatly helped by a European woman who had great knowledge of the suffrage movement here), and we applied to bring a deputation to the Secretary of State and to Lord Chelmsford. We were granted permission, and I think Mr. Montagu will remember it was a very representative gathering, that left out no section of the community in its membership. There we put certain proposals before him, and—whether it was seriously meant I do not know—I was asked by the Viceroy whether, if I brought a resolution before the National Congress, which was coming off in a week or two, it would be acceptable to Indian men. I then said that I would try, and that I would do it. A few days later I gave notice to the National Congress that I was going to bring forward this resolution. In deference to the advice of my friend, Mr. Banerjea, however, whose own deputation has now supported my demand, I offered to put it off till the question had been a little more ventilated in the public Press. A few months later, at the Bombay Congress, convened to consider the reforms, I moved that resolution in the Congress, when it was carried by a large majority; and six months later, in Delhi, under the presidency of Pandit Madan Mohar Malaviya, who is himself a noted guardian of conservative and social traditions in the north, it was carried unanimously. Previously to that, in the various Provincial Congresses, social Congresses and Conferences, it had been unanimously carried.

Women have proved their capacity, as I have shown by statistics in my list, of movements in which they have taken part. They have shown that they can, given the opportunity, rise to any heights and share any kind of responsibility in which their brothers have taken part. I remember being a member of a deputation on the question of Indentured Labour which was received by the Viceroy. That was not the first but the second instance in modern Indian history—by modern I mean since the Moghul period—that women were received in deputations on any important matter. Then, as Lord Chelmsford said, if women took a more active part in questions that were agitating the mind of the nation—I do not suppose he meant political questions, but political questions are not the only questions in which we are interested—we should render great service and be able to present the inner standpoint which does not often reach the official channels.

I am not the most able or the most eloquent exponent of this case, but unfortunately my comrades were not able to come, because most of them who do find time to devote to national problems are mothers of families who are not sufficiently grown up as mine are, to leave them to take long journeys on any mission of this kind. But I may state that Hindu women and Moslem women, Parsee women and Indian Christian women, Sikhs and Jains and women of the depressed classes, among whom I own some very intimate friends, have charged me in their name to make this appeal, should I get a chance, to this Committee, and if the Committee did not give me a chance of a hearing, then to the British public. Because we feel that we are sufficiently detached from the immediate excitements that cause passion in the hearts of active politicians, to realise that after all if this right comes to us it must come to us as a gift from the British statesmen who rule in the name of the British people. And I am here to-day to plead this cause, not to ask for it as a concession or a favour, but because it is our right by historic tradition. It symbolises for us the hope of a future which will not depend on office or power. We Indian women do not care for office; we do not care for power as power; we are not ambitious in that sense. Always, I think, the home will remain the unit of central government in India, and it will never require any change. But for that central government to be effective, for that central government to carry authority, and for that central government to be able to shape and control the ideals and destinies of India, we feel that this authoritative sanction of the Indian women's voice should be granted, and that can only be given if you realise that it means unity for India, it means for India prestige in the eyes of other nations whose taunt to us is that our women have no place in the scheme of things. It is by the right of a past inheritance, it is by the hope of future progress, that I make this appeal to you; and the woman who to-day stands in India as the highest Indian lady in the land, Her Highness the Begum of Nepal, who cannot be accused of any radical tendencies, a woman who believes in the Purdah, a woman who observes the Purdah, a woman who follows most strictly all the tenets of the Islamic faith, said, it is only right that the woman of India should claim her place in this franchise scheme.

There is only one more point I want to put forward, because after all it is a matter of practical politics, as you call it here. It is said that the Purdah system is going to make the franchise impossible. But I do not understand why the Purdah system should be thrown in our face when only a portion of India observes Purdah, and in no Province is every section of womanhood a Purdah nashin. Some of the upper classes observe Purdah, but I have never known Purdah to come in the way of anything a woman ever wanted to do. I lived all my life whenever I had a home of my own in the Moslem city of Hyderabad. There women go up for university examinations, they attend sports, they watch parade, and they see all the theatres without breaking their purdah. Arrangements are made for them; it is tacitly understood that it is their right. It was suggested that perhaps British India is more progressive than native States in matters of politics, but as a matter of social opportunity and social amelioration for the Purdahnashin I think I might easily say that the native States, understanding that woman has her place equally in everything that belongs to the nation recognises that she should be given a chance. I do not think that is going to make any difference to the electoral system at all. In Bombay, for instance, where women have exercised their right, as Mr. Patel told you, for 40 years, only the other day a friend of mine stood for a municipal ward, and every woman who had a vote went to the polling booth herself and registered her vote, and nobody turned a hair. We are not asking for any concession. If you say that in this experimental stage for the next ten years it will complicate matters to have a separate polling booth for Purdahnashins, do not have a separate polling booth to start with; let it be conceded that the principle is right, and that you are going to give the franchise to women on the same qualifications as and on the same terms and tests as the men, and leave it to the local authorities to adjust this matter for themselves in those Provinces where the demand from eligible Purdahnashins is so great as to make it possible. I do not think that it will be impossible to find efficient women officials who will guard the integrity of this polling booth and see that no fraudulent voting is practised.

I have nothing more to say, and I do not wish to re-duplicate what I said in my Memorandum. I am not here to make a speech, only to plead a cause, and I think that the chivalry of English manhood will not be deaf to a cry of which I am the voice on behalf of Indian women.

2146. You have dealt with the only point which was not clear in your last remark. You have told us how you think the mechanical difficulty of voting could be got over. You propose that no special arrangements should be made, but if in any locality it is found to be necessary you think it could be perfectly well adjusted by the officials in consultation with those who know what the wishes of women on the question are?—I should think that would be the easiest solution, but I do not want to press that point now. I think it might, in its experimental stage, be tried first in places where the purdah is very strong. Elsewhere I think it will hardly present any difficulty.

Chairman.] We are very much obliged to you for coming here, and we have listened to your appeal with great interest and pleasure.

(The Witness is directed to withdraw.)

SIR FRANK SLY, is re-called; and further Examined, as follows:—

Chairman.

2147. You were a member of Lord Southborough's Committee?—Yes.

2148. Dealing especially with Franchise?—Yes.

2149. You were also a member of the Indian Civil Service?—Yes.

2150. What is the present post you occupy?—At the present moment my substantive post is Commissioner in the Central Provinces, but I am employed on special duties for Lord Southborough's Committee.

2151. You have heard Lord Southborough's examination, and you have had this questionnaire before you?—Yes.

2152. We shall be glad to hear any observations you wish to make in supplementing Lord Southborough's evidence, and in elucidation of these questions?—Lord Southborough gave such a full account of the work of the Franchise Committee that I only wish to supplement it on certain points. I have prepared a written statement—which, unfortunately, has not had time to be printed, because I did not know I should be called so soon—in which I supplement his evidence by first of all describing in perhaps more detail than he did the procedure followed by the Committee, especially with reference to the extent as to how far we followed the original proposals of Local Governments, and also in regard to our inquiry into the electoral machinery available for carrying out elections on the basis of the franchise proposed by us. I have also dealt with certain suggestions which have been made before your Committee for the extension of the franchise, particularly as regards the proposed literacy test, a test separate from the property qualification; also with regard to the suggestion that the limit of income might be lowered, and that it might be possible to introduce a franchise based on a wages basis. I have explained why the Committee felt unable to accept any of those proposals.

In the next paragraph I have dealt with the question of women suffrage, which has just been so eloquently pleaded before you by Mrs. Naidu. The main point in my note that I wish to make is, that so far as that question came before the Franchise Committee it was almost wholly a question of women franchise being urged by men and not by women. We heard a good deal of evidence by men in favour of women franchise. We only heard Mrs. Naidu and some other representatives of an association called the All-India Women's Federation, which I am sure Mrs. Naidu would be quite ready to admit by no means represents in any respect the general body of Indian women. I myself tried throughout the inquiry to induce certain educated Indian women that I met to come before us and urge the women's franchise, and on every occasion I was told by them that they would decline to come forward to urge women's franchise; that they desired to leave politics to the men and keep their homes to themselves. It may be thought that I was perhaps unsuccessful because I was an Englishman out of touch with Indian women, but I also know that one of my Indian colleagues also tried his very best to induce certain educated Indian women to come forward and urge before us the point of female suffrage. He also was unsuccessful in obtaining a single witness outside that Federation to come forward and plead the cause of women.

I would like to explain that during our inquiry the demand for women's suffrage was not very strong, at least that is my estimate of it, in the Provinces that we first visited, in Bihar and Orissa, in the United Provinces and in the Punjab, but it increased in volume as we went along throughout India, and reached its maximum in Bombay, where the custom of the seclusion of women is not so prevalent as it is in many other parts of India. We inquired very carefully into the working of female franchise in certain elections to local bodies where it at present prevails, and the evidence we received on the point was that it was very sparingly exercised in those cases except perhaps in the City of Bombay. There was also stated before us the case of municipal elections in Madras, where, until 1897, women enjoyed the vote on the same terms as men. In 1897 there was a new local self-government Act, one of the provisions of which withdrew the suffrage from women, and according to the information received by us, that right was withdrawn without practically any public opposition or discussion of any kind, showing that even as late as 1897 in Madras this was not a real live practical question at all. Then I think the Committee was very much influenced by the fact that the witnesses who urged female suffrage before us, including Mrs. Naidu, did plead that in order to give it practical effect it would be necessary, not merely to set up separate polling booths for women, but also to appoint separate polling officers to visit the women in their homes in their villages, in order to record their votes. An Australian precedent very properly was quoted by them in favour of that arrangement. I myself, and I think the other members of the Committee, felt that under present conditions in India it would be impracticable to make any arrangement under which female polling officers to the number required could be appointed to record the votes of women in their homes.

In regard to the very important question of communal representation, I have tried to give an outline as to how that question has presented itself to me during my 32 years' experience of India—how, when I first went there, the communal feeling was strong as between Hindoo and Mohammedan and between certain other races and sections of Hindoos, how difficulties arose at that time, how as a general rule all communities live together in friendly relations, but how there was a feeling of antagonism that was liable to break out at any moment, and it was a great cause of anxiety to the Administrator. In those days I think the tendency was for the individual or for the caste or a section of the caste who rose in wealth and importance, to endeavour to raise themselves in the scale of the Hindoo religion, to get themselves into a higher caste or to form a new caste superior to the caste to which they originally belonged. Then later in my experience came the growth of what is often termed the feeling of nationality in India. The effect of that, I think, on the communal feeling was to lessen it very much. It is true that it was largely confined to the educated classes, but it also did permeate down amongst at least some sections of the masses, and the communal feeling was then expressed more on the lines of a desire for the spread of education amongst the particular community and caste, and of desiring to take a part in local affairs, and thus raise the whole caste, or section of the caste, to a higher position rather than the old method of endeavouring to force their way into a superior caste.

As regards political matters at that time, I think that the masses, including the so-called backward and depressed classes, took very little interest in purely political matters. They were content, I think, to rely largely on the Government for the protection of their political privileges. When the claims for political advancement became strong, I think the politicians themselves largely realised that it was impossible for them to advance at the pace and in the direction which they desired unless they carried with them the masses more largely than they had done in the past. And from that factor, and from the general advancement of education, a new movement arose, or at least gained strength, a movement towards the education of the backward classes and castes, a movement in favour of compulsory, free, primary education. And another instance I would give would be the great efforts that were made by societies like the Depressed Classes Mission to raise up these lower strata of India to a level in which they could take their rightful part in the political life of the country.

Now to come to the last stage, there came the publication of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, and with that publication I think there has been a very marked revival of communal feeling in India. It is perhaps the irony of fate that that Report, with its powerful presentment of the case against communal representation, has given rise to the strongest expression of communal feeling that I have experienced in India throughout my service. The backward classes, the depressed classes, small communities, separate trade interests and associations, have all urged upon us the vital importance of the protection of their interests by communal representation. This was the universal evidence given by representatives of these classes and communities before the Franchise Committee. It is true that certain leading politicians of the more extreme school were opposed to the grant of communal representation on any very large scale, but so far as the representatives of those classes were concerned I think I am right in stating that there was not a single witness of them before us who did not strongly urge the necessity for communal representation for the protection of their special interests under any system of responsible government.

Lastly, I have dealt with the question of direct election to the Council of State. I have examined as far as I could the scheme put forward by the Government of India for direct election to the Council of State, and have shown that the constituencies will be of enormous area, that they will contain a very large population, and that any system based on such a method of direct election seems to be almost a negation of the right principles of direct election. Also that a small restricted electorate on the lines of what is called a senatorial franchise will result in India in practically the representation of only one class, and that is the landed class. It seems to me a very dangerous form of political experiment to start a scheme on which your Provincial Legislative Councils will be based on a fairly wide and extended franchise, and at the top a Council of State which must represent solely a small aristocratic and plutocratic caste, tempered perhaps by a few other qualifications. I have explained how it was that, mainly on these grounds, the Franchise Committee felt themselves unable, at least at the present stage, to recommend any system of direct election either to the Council of State or to the Indian Legislative Assembly. Another reason which did influence us a great deal was the position of Local Governments, who felt that whereas they might reasonably carry out one general election throughout India, if you were going to introduce at one step a system which would involve at least two, and if you take into account the Indian Legislative Assembly three, general elections, there was grave danger of a breakdown, particularly in the holding of three general elections in a country where hitherto neither the people nor the Government has had any experience whatever of even a single general election. That is roughly the outline of the note that I have prepared on the franchise matters.

Lord Islington.

2155. With regard to those particular communities which you noticed had revived the communal feeling, would you say that they are now under your franchise scheme represented in electoral communities?—The Franchise Report explains how we dealt with the claims of these particular communities, how we accepted communal representation in certain communities which, according to the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, would not have got such separate representation, and how we disallowed the claims of certain other communities which we did not think made out their case sufficiently for that form of representation. I should like, if I might, in illustration of this question, to take the case of the Punjab Province. When we made our franchise inquiry into the Punjab, we had, I think, every Mohammedan witness come before us and say that they must have communal representation for Mohammedans as in other parts of India—although, as a matter of fact, the Mohammedans form a majority of the population in that Province. All representatives of the Sikhs claimed not merely communal representation on the basis of their population, but claimed that they should have one-third of the representation in the Punjab Province on the plea that they had given to the Government one-third of the recruits raised in that Province, and therefore if they protected the country to the extent of one-third they ought to receive one-third of the representation. And more than that, so strong were they in their communal feeling that they wished us to lay down as a condition of the franchise that every voter that came to the polls to register his vote as a Sikh should be required to recite before the polling officer the orthodox Sikh creed; and this they desired in order to protect their community against the possibility of persons claiming to be Sikhs who were not according to their view strictly Sikhs having any say in regard to the election of Sikh representatives. When you got the Mohammedans claiming half, or more than half, and the Sikhs coming in and claiming a third at least, there was very little left for the Hindoos and any other communities, and the Hindoo witnesses came before us and pleaded that they would be squeezed out under the claims made by these other two big communities, and therefore they must have more than their share of the representation. As far as I can recollect, there was only one, or at the most two, witnesses in the Punjab who came forward and said: "We are Indians, and we are content to allow our interests to be safeguarded by a general electorate."

2156. Did you find that very emphatic cummunal individuality equally marked in other Provinces?—No. I think the strongest expression of it was in the Punjab, but throughout India I cannot remember a single Mohammedan witness who came forward and did not claim communal representation for Mohammedans. As I say, all the representatives of other communities practically—certainly the representative witnesses who came before us—also claimed separate communal representation for their own community.

2157. So that upon the evidence you received in India there does exist to-day a very strong individuality in the respective communities of India?—Yes, a very strong desire amongst small communities to have separate representation on a communal basis.

2158. With regard to the franchise itself, I understood from Lord Southborough's evidence that, speaking generally, your Committee accepted the scheme for electorates in each Province respectively as put before you by the Local Governments?—I do not think that is perhaps a full statement of the case. Each Local Government prepared for us a scheme for the franchise of their Province, which was put before the Committee. That scheme was tested by the examination of official witnesses in support of it; we also heard the evidence of the non-official witnesses; we also took into account the views of the added members, both the official and the non-official, and it was only after consideration of all the material placed before us that we had a conference with the Local Government, and as the result of that conference, and hearing the views of the Local Government upon all the material before us, we then prepared schemes which generally commanded the approval of the Local Government. But those schemes, I think, in all Provinces varied in very material respects from the original schemes put forward by the Local Governments. There were important variations in the franchise, important variations in regard to the representation of communal and special interests; there were important variations in regard to the proposed constituencies, urban and rural, and very important variations in regard to the size of the Legislative Councils and other matters, so that although it is true that our proposals generally commanded the approval of the Local Governments, it must not be assumed that those proposals were the same as those originally put forward by the Local Governments; they varied considerably.

2159. I would like to take as a concrete instance Assam, and merely for information I would like to ask you, having gone through this elaborate procedure which you have just described before you came to the conclusion, can you tell us what influenced you and your colleagues in giving to Assam a higher proportion of an electorate than that of any other Province in India?—The original scheme put forward by the Assam Government was a scheme of franchise based on the household and not on the individual. The idea of the Chief Commissioner of Assam, in his original scheme, was that every separate household in Assam should be recognised as a voting unit and be given a vote as a household. When we examined that scheme in the light of evidence we found it was unworkable—that if you wanted the franchise at all in Assam it must be based on the qualifications of the individual and not on the qualifications of the household. And therefore we changed the basis of the franchise in Assam from the household basis to the property qualification of the individual. The Chief Commissioner, who was very keen on his principle that each household should more or less get a vote, was strongly insistent that the franchise should be broad enough in order to include a large proportion of these householders at any rate. He urged his case largely on the ground that Assam was a Province in which there was a system by which the land was held largely direct from Government by individuals, and that it was desirable in that Province that as large a proportion of these individuals as could be dealt with by the Government should receive the vote. It is true that the franchise in Assam is substantially wider than it is in some, if not all, of the other Provinces of India.

2160. In other words, the Chief Commissioner really converted you to his original scheme?—The Chief Commissioner converted us to the position that under the local conditions of Assam it was desirable that the vote should be as wide as possible, and that his Government was prepared to carry out an election on the large number of voters which our franchise gives. On the other hand, take the Punjab, which is perhaps the most restricted franchise. The view of the Local Government there was very strongly in the opposite direction—that, at least in the initial stages of this experiment, it was desirable to restrict the franchise to people of a certain position and a certain status in society, and that it would be very easy afterwards to widen the franchise if it were found to prove workable, but impossible in the future to curtail it. The desire in the Punjab was that the vote should be considered as a privilege, and it was thought would be valued more as a privilege than if it were put upon a very broad basis. And again, in that Province they were not prepared to guarantee that the Government could carry out an election on such a wide franchise as certainly some members of our Committee desired.

2161. What was the impression left on your mind as a result of these conferences? Take, as a concrete instance, Assam and the Punjab: Was it your impression that the decision come to was a decision upon the inherent merits of the Province and the conditions prevailing there, or rather due to the individual opinions of the Chief of the Government who was making the proposal?—I think it was influenced to a certain extent by the views of the Government; but in all cases we followed the terms of our reference, which were to make the franchise as broad as possible consistently with the avoidance of breakdown of the machinery through weight of numbers. I think the Committee felt that in the initial stage there was some advantage in having a diversity between Province and Province, so that when the Parliamentary Commission goes out twelve years hence it will have before it the experience of the working of different schemes in different Provinces. We did not attempt, and we did not think it desirable even to attempt, to obtain absolute uniformity throughout India.

2162. As you went through India you did not see any great advantage in aiming at what I may term uniformity of standard for an electorate?—I think that is so.

2163. You thought that, on the whole, it was better to have a complete variety?—Yes; and of course we had very much to take into account the statement of the Local Government with regard to the electoral machinery that was available. If a Province told us that they could not carry through a general election on such a wide franchise as some of our evidence pointed to, we felt we could not undertake the responsibility of forcing on the Local Government a franchise which they themselves said they would be unable to work.

2164. Were you satisfied, after this conference, that, for instance, Assam offered greater facilities in the direction of a wide franchise, with regard to its machinery and local conditions, than the Punjab did?—We were satisfied that Assam could carry out an election on the franchise proposed by them. In each Province we went into fairly full detail in regard to that matter.

2165. And you were equally satisfied that the Punjab could not carry out a wider franchise than that which was offered?—I was not personally satisfied on that point.

2166. You were not personally satisfied?—No.

Major ORMSBY-GORE.
Sir J. D. REES.
Mr. SPOOR.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE LORD BRODRICK (VISCOUNT MIDLETON), AND AFTERWARDS THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE EARL OF SELBORNE, IN THE CHAIR.

SIR FRANK SLY, is recalled; and further Examined, as follows:—

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton.)

2167. You put in your Memorandum now to which you referred on Wednesday?—Yes. (See Appendix 2.)

Mr. Bennett.

2168. You referred on Wednesday to the movement in the direction of nationalisation having been encouraged by certain social and education work done by various societies?—Yes.

2169. The necessary effect of that is uplifting and strengthening; it strengthens and uplifts those communities affected?—Yes.

2170. By whom have those movements mainly been carried out?—They have been mainly carried out by the educated classes in India.

2171. What castes would be included in those?—Brahmins would predominate.

2172. We have heard a great deal of the obstacles to the working of Parliamentary Institutions, which consist in varieties of race, varieties of caste and varieties of religion. How far do you regard those as serious elements obstructing the political development of India?—I think that during my long service in India those difficulties have considerably lessened, and are not now so great as they were 20 or 30 years ago. Although at present they do constitute considerable difficulty, I believe that the educative effect of the scheme of reform that may be introduced in India must ultimately lead to their very great lessening.

2173. As a practical fact the men of various communities do associate and do work together in reasonable harmony, do they not?—Ordinarily, yes.

2174. And in the Legislatures you have not found that religious difficulties are an obstacle to hearty co-operation?—No obstacle, I think, in hearty co-operation in regard to political matters which are common to all sections of the people, but I think there have been cases in which there have been difficulties in regard to questions affecting particular communities.

2175. Do you find that the individual communities, so to speak, grind their own axe? Is there a marked tendency to that?—I do not think so.

Major Ormsby-Gore.

2176. The only important modification which the Government of India now suggests in the scheme of representation—that is to say, the number of seats proposed by your Committee—is in the case of Bengal, is it not? They want to increase the Mohammedan representation?—That is the most important; but there are others, such as the substantial increase in the numbers of members to represent the depressed classes in the different Provinces. These are the two most important that I can recollect.

2177. Will you give me your opinion on the former proposal to increase the Mohammedan seats in Bengal. Do you think it is desirable?—Lord Southborough has already put in a Memorandum giving his and my joint reasons for disapproving of that proposal.

2178. It would cause the reopening of the whole question of the Lucknow Compact and the over-representation which has been granted to Mohammedans in the United Provinces, for example, would it not?—Undoubtedly.

2179. Then, with regard to the depressed classes, the only way to get representation of those classes is by nomination, I presume?—At the present time.

2180. Do you contemplate that only as a temporary expedient until a political organisation has grown up among the depressed classes?—Until a political organisation has grown up among the depressed classes, and until education and public spirit is spread to a greater extent amongst them, so that a suitable electorate can be formed.

2182. On the ground of the enormous size of constituencies?—Yes.

2183. That would mean that there are not men sufficiently well-known throughout so large a constituency to engage the attention and interest of the electors?—Yes. And, further than that, I think that any constituency comparable in size, for instance, to the whole of England and Wales is an unworkable constituency, even with men that are fairly well known; that it is impossible under such conditions for the different candidates to get into proper touch with their constituencies and to represent their views faithfully.

2184. So you are convinced that if we wish to replace the Council of State, which is a sort of glorified Grand Committee, by a Senate, any such Senate would have to be composed by indirect election; that is the only way to form it?—By indirect election and perhaps by nomination.

2185. Do you suggest nomination by someone other than the Government of India? Do you mean nomination by the Provincial Governments?—Yes.

2186. With regard to the Franchise, do you not think that the proposal of the Franchise Committee is, to put it mildly, rather a conservative one—that small electorate?—Having regard to the conditions of India at the present time, I believe it is largely a radical one, and the impression that I gained going round India on the Franchise Committee was that even the non-officials were very much surprised by the extent of the Franchise that was put forward by the Local Governments; that when we started our inquiry they had not anticipated that such a widely extended Franchise would be conceded.

2187. In the statement which you have put in, in the second paragraph you say that your proposals varied frequently in material respects from the schemes put forward by Local Governments; but, speaking generally, were not you necessarily influenced very largely by the recommendations of the Local Governments?—Certainly.

2188. Do you think this Franchise will in any real degree satisfy Indian opinion?—So far as the first stage of their progress towards responsible government is concerned, I believe that this Franchise will satisfy reasonable public opinion in India. I have not been in India, but, so far as I have read the criticisms of it in the Indian newspapers, the proposals have generally been favourably received.

2189. Judging by the evidence that we have here already from Indians, it does appear that there is a very great deal of dissatisfaction and feeling that the Franchise should be considerably extended. Now there has been agitation we know ever since the proposals were made public. Will not this agitation continue and probably grow unless the Franchise is widened in some way?—So far as I have heard the evidence which has been given before this Committee that statement should, I think, be limited to the representatives of the more advanced political organisations in India, and cannot in my opinion be taken as a true index of public opinion in India generally.

2190. I take it that those advanced organisations which you refer to have a certain claim to be considered as representative?—Certainly.

2191. Of quite a big volume of opinion?—A big volume of opinion of an advanced political character amongst politicians.

2192. I imagine the tendency will be that advanced opinion will continue to strengthen, and agitation will go on for a bigger measure of self-government?—I would not like to try to forecast what the future would be, but I would like to point out that with the next Parliamentary Commission there will be ample opportunity for enlarging the Franchise, if the Parliamentary Commission considers that the working of the Franchise adopted has been satisfactory.

2193. Do you agree it is desirable that a larger section of the industrial classes should have the vote. I am asking for your personal opinion?—So far as the industrial classes in India are concerned, I think it is impossible to draw any parallel between the industrial classes in India, and the industrial classes in England, for instance.

2195. You refer in your memorandum to the question we have already had discussed once or twice, that a Franchise qualification based on wages earned is desirable?—Yes.

2196. You point out possible results, such as that votes might be at the command of the factory owner, and so on, but even assuming that those difficulties did temporarily arise, do you not think that this qualification of a certain earning capacity would make a reasonable basis for the Franchise, and probably be the only practicable way in which the industrial classes could be brought in?—I am opposed to the principle that there should be any Franchise based solely on a wage earning capacity, because, in my opinion, it would act unfairly to other classes of the community. But what we did endeavour to do on the Franchise, was to secure a qualification based on a limit of income. In some Provinces we found that there was no satisfactory method of ascertaining incomes smaller than those which were taxed under the income tax limit, but in other Provinces we did find that there were certain forms of local taxation based on incomes substantially lower than the Imperial Income Tax, and in those cases we did adopt a lower basis of income. I do not think that wages should be put on any preferential basis compared with other forms of income.

2197. But you are getting the other forms into the scheme already. Do not you think a great deal of dissatisfaction is likely to be caused amongst those classes who are not income tax paying classes? Is not the desire, as far as possible, to include them in the scheme?—If you included them purely on a wage basis you would exclude very large sections of the community who are equally entitled with wage earners to representation. For instance, there are the large classes of small shopkeepers, small traders: there are large classes of people with small fixed incomes, and other classes of the population which seem to me as much entitled to representation as the wage-earning class.

2198. I quite agree with you that it is very desirable that all classes should be represented, but have your Committee no practical alternative to suggest to this one of a wage-earning basis? You refer to this in your memorandum. I was wondering if you had any alternative?—Our alternative, the one we have adopted, is in every Province to put the income limit as low as was possible on the material available—that where the income tax assessment was the only method of calculating income we had to take that, but in Provinces where there were local taxes based on a substantially lower level of income we have taken that, and I anticipate that in the future this form of taxation will spread considerably to other Provinces, and will form a suitable basis for the Franchise.

Sir J. D. Rees.

2199. You sat beside Sir James Meston during his evidence, I think. May the Committee take it that subject to supplemental statements made here or any actual contradictions you adopt and agree with Sir James Meston's evidence?—Lord Southborough I think you refer to.

2200. Were not you here when Sir James spoke?—No.

2201. Sir James expressed various opinions. Amongst others he was in favour of a separate purse. Will you say what you think of that?—I cannot pretend to any special financial knowledge at all, but, so far as the proposals for a separate purse have been considered by me, I am opposed to them.

2202. You are opposed to a separate purse?—Yes.

2203. Do you think there is much in the objection made, which has been stated here by witnesses, that it would deprive Indian public opinion of any control over taxation, and the Minister of the initiative to which apparently much importance is attached?—My main objections to a separate purse are that I think it is wrong in principle to separate off the funds of a Province into two distinct portions. I do not believe that system will have the results anticipated by Sir James Meston in securing harmony between the two halves of the Government. I believe that it will lead to more friction than a joint purse.

2204. You heard the evidence of Mr. Madhav Rao?—Yes.

2205. Do you adopt his opinion that the people of India generally dislike the Indian Civil Servants with whom they come in contact?—I certainly think that opinion is incorrect. I would like to add that during comparatively recent years in India there has been strong agitation amongst politicians against the Indian Civil Servants. My own personal belief is that that agitation has been largely made for political purposes in order to strengthen their claim towards responsible government, and I should be very sorry if I thought that it reflected the more sober opinion, even of politicians.

2206. Have you served in, or are you familiar with, the native States at all?—No.

2207. So far as you know, is the present Reform movement an anti-caste movement, or is it regarded generally as an orthodox movement in its character? Is there anything anti-caste in it, such as there was in the early reformers like the Brama Samaj and the Arva Samaj?—None whatever.

2208. You have heard the theory put forward that the necessity was at the present time to provide for protection of the lower castes. Is that a true picture of Indian Society, that there is an undermass requiring protection against the upper classes, the Brahmins and kindred classes?—I think that would be an over-statement of the case. So far as the evidence came before us on the Franchise Committee from the representatives of what are termed the backward classes and depressed classes, there was no opposition before us to the introduction of the scheme, but there was an intense desire that they should have separate representation under that scheme.

2209. Is it correct or is it utterly erroneous to say that Hindustani is understood in your part of India? Is it the lingua franca all round?—It is certainly not the case in some parts of the Central Provinces.

2210. Are you familiar with the Governor in Council system of government? Have you had any experience of it?—None.

2211. As regards the Chief Commissioner form of government, is the part taken by the Government of India an extremely active and effective part in that government, or is it merely a very general and indefinite supervision?—It is more than an indefinite supervision, considerably more.

2212. Would you say that it is so large a part of the actual administration of a Chief Commissionership that you cannot liberalise a Chief Commissionership without at the same time liberalising the whole system of government pursued in that area? Is it a fact or not that the responsibility being given to the Local Administration must leaven the whole administration, including that portion of it which the Government of India carries on?—I think that in order to carry out successfully in the Provinces the system embodied in the Bill it is essential that the Provinces should have much more latitude with regard to matters of administration than they have had in the past; that it must be subject to substantially less interference by the Central Government.

2214. What I mean is this. The Government of India participate equally, to some extent at any rate, in the administration of the Chief Commissionership?—Yes.

2215. It is said that no advance is made in liberalising the Government of India because there is no responsibility conceded to it of the same class which is conceded to the Local Government. Can you say that the concession of such a responsibility to the Local Government does not liberalise the whole system?—I think the statement is untrue in fact—I think that even under the Bill there will be considerable advances in the Government of India, the most important of which is the large increase of elected element in the Legislative Assembly. I think it should also be taken into account that under the Bill the aims and objects of the Government of India are distinctly laid down, and that that must necessarily largely influence their policy.

2216. My honourable friend here spoke of the industrial classes and of their having a vote as such. Am I right in supposing that in the big cities, Bombay for instance, and Madras and Calcutta, many of those operatives will have a vote under this scheme?—I think that with the present rate of wages in India a certain number of the operatives will undoubtedly get a vote under the proposals of the Franchise Committee, but I would not like to say that any very large proportion of them would get a vote.

2217. Can you establish any real essential resemblance between the old Indian Guilds, to the extent to which they survive, and modern conditions of labour?—I should have said wholly none.

2218. You have had a particularly long experience of the Ryot, the Indian cultivator?—Yes.

2220. You state in your evidence that no witnesses could be brought forward in favour of the enfranchisement of women from among women. Was any effort made to get a Nair lady who has the completest freedom possible? Why did not you have one of those to give evidence?—I myself, in Madras, met a certain number of Indian ladies, and suggested to them that if they really meant this to be a living proposition, some representative of them should come forward and give evidence in their favour, and I met with no success. I think one of my Indian colleagues from Madras, who is coming as a witness before you, will be able to answer better about the Nair ladies.

2221. You say that seclusion is not so prevalent as you get south. You are probably aware that as you get to the end there is no seclusion whatever. You say that the publication of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report led to a marked revival of communal feeling in India. Do you really mean that, or do you mean that the circumstances which gave birth to that Report gave birth to a strong desire to obtain a vote, which naturally expressed itself in a request for communal representation? Is it correct to say that the Report inspired the revival?—I believe it to be correct.

2222. The statement as made by you?—Yes; the statement as made.

2223. You speak of the communal system—you say it was due to an apprehension on the part of small communities that they would not be able to secure that their rights and privileges should be looked after. Is it not the case, really, the most conspicuous case, the exact contrary to that? Is not the Madras case, a request of 90 per cent. of the population, to have a representation from which the upper classes should be excluded?—Yes; that is one case; but I wish to emphasise the fact that many other communities, as stated in the Report, and small communities, did come before the Franchise Committee and ask for a separate communal electorate.

2224. You say a comparatively large franchise is given to Assam, and the Committee evinced some curiosity as to why that should be so. Lord Islington asked you questions. Is that in any way due to the fact that the population of Assam is continually being increased by the immigration from other parts of India of persons who, in the European tea industry, acquire considerable competence and settle there?—In evidence before the Franchise Committee it was stated that the tea industry was responsible for having introduced a very large percentage. I cannot remember what exactly the percentage is, without referring to the papers, of the total population of Assam.

Sir Henry Craik.

2225. Before touching the points of your special Report, I would like to touch, for a moment, on one question raised by Sir John Rees with regard to the separate purse. You say you do not speak as one specially conversant with finance?—That is so.

2226. But you must have formed some general views. Your reason against a separate purse was that you thought it would introduce an undue separation between the two parts of the Government?—Yes.

2227. You take a different view as regards a separate purse from the Government of India?—Yes

2228. But, surely, the idea of a diarchy is to impose a certain separate responsibility on two parts of the Government?—Yes.

2229. How can you have that separate responsibility detached from separate financial responsibility?—My view is that under the system, as it stands, even with a joint purse, you will get separate responsibility in financial matters up to a certain limit—for instance, the Minister will be responsible for his policy of expenditure in regard to transferred subjects, and will be responsible for the taxation that may be necessary to carry out his policy.

2230. How can you attach that responsibility for taxation immediately and directly to one Minster, if there is not a separate purse, if any addition that he makes to the expenditure becomes a matter of general finance of the Provincial Government, and not his own particular section?—So far as I visualise the scheme, there are certain funds available in a Province for expenditure according to the joint deliberation of both halves of the Government. A Budget is prepared, providing, so far as possible, for the needs of all portions of the Government. So far as the reserved expenditure is concerned, there is the provision that the Governor may certify certain expenditure as being essential for the maintenance of those reserved subjects. So far as the transferred subjects are concerned, the Minister has to be content either with the balance that is left, or has to impose additional taxation to meet the needs of his policy.

2231. I am not trying to controvert your opinion—I am asking for my own information. I hear it said that there are certain sums available for the needs of the Province. That may be so in the past, but surely as the responsible Government develops your annual Budget must be met in the Province by estimates of the sums which are to be raised by taxation under different heads. You will not have then certain sums allocated and which are earmarked for certain uses. You will have your annual Estimates and you will base your Budget upon those Estimates, and you will allot your taxation accordingly, and if it is going to be a joint Budget and a joint taxation, how can anyone but feel "there is a heavy burden put upon me by this tax"? And this or that Minister is responsible for it?—I think the responsibility will be clear. If the Minister desires to have, for instance, a large increase of educational expenditure and that increase cannot cannot be met from the existing revenue raised in the Province, it will then be the duty of the Minister to impose additional taxation in order to meet that increased expenditure.

2232. I beg your pardon, will it be the duty of the Minister? Will it not be the duty of the Minister and all his colleagues as a whole? It will not be the duty of the Minister to say, "I wish a tax-increase in order to met the expenditure I propose"; the responsibility for the expenditure will rest upon him, the responsibility for raising money that is necessary for that expenditure will rest upon all his colleagues as well?—With due respect, I do not think that is the scheme formulated in the Joint Report.

2233. Where have I misunderstood it?—So far as the Joint Report is concerned, the whole of that additional taxation is to be introduced by the Minister on his responsibility. It may be after joint deliberation by the two halves of the Government, but under that Report the responsibility for increased taxation remains alone with the Minister, and in that respect, for good working, it is necessary to have some change.

2235. And that was in conformity with your own thirty-two years of experience in India? Have you no fears that there may be difficulties?—I have no fear.

2237. Apart altogether from questions of caste, or of the tyranny of caste, or anything else, are there not influences at work throughout these large communities of India that might help the manipulation of an election conducted on what appeared to be a very wide popular representation? Would it not be possible, I mean, that certain classes, not very desirable classes, might exercise a very illegitimate influence in these elections?—That is a possibility, but I believe the danger that you apprehend would be much greater under a restricted Franchise than it would be under a wide Franchise.

2238. That points rather against what you say, that you would rather increase the Franchise?—It is my view that if there is any danger of manipulation of the electorate by, I think you used the words "undesirable classes" or by undue influences——

2240. Does that lead you to regret that you placed the Franchise on a narrower basis? Does it lead you to think that you would like to revise your scheme?—I think that the Franchise Committee based their Franchise on the widest basis that they considered feasible in India under present conditions, and I think they contemplate, and I also contemplate——

2241. Feasible in what sense? You are not speaking of mere machinery?—No; feasible having regard, first of all, to the machinery available for carrying out the elections, having regard also to the present wholly untrained electorate, and having regard to the fact that we desire that the vote should, for the success of the experiment, be limited to the classes who might, under the educative system of the Franchise, be in a position to learn what a responsible vote meant.

2242. You used the words "uneducated and unaccustomed constituencies," I think?—If I used the word "uneducated" I did not mean in the sense of education—I meant unaccustomed to the system under which policy is influenced by their own votes.

2243. You do see certain great dangers in an unduly extended Franchise?—Yes.

2245. You think you have just hit upon the exact mean?—That is what we have endeavoured to do.

2246. Do not you think that a constituency very broadcast and presumably less advanced in educated habit of exercising political power is more likely to be under those influences than a more educated and restricted Franchise?—I have already given my opinion more or less to a contrary effect, and I think that your introduction of the words "more educated" is misleading.

2247. I did not mean it to be, but in what sense do you think it is misleading?—If you wish to have a Franchise restricted to what are ordinarily termed educated persons, that would be an exceedingly limited Franchise in India, one that I do not think anybody could contemplate as satisfactory, even for the first step towards responsible government.

2248. The Franchise is raised up to a certain level. You have refused to extend it beyond that level, because you think that the people are not accustomed to it?—That was only one of the reasons.

2249. I do not want to argue, but it seems to me that you would dread it more under a limited Franchise than you would under a cultivated one?—I think the misunderstanding between us is that I certainly do not regard our Franchise proposals as resulting in a very limited electorate, considering the present conditions of India.

2250. You think you have gone as far as you fairly can?—Yes.

2251. Could you tell me from your long experience what proportion of the whole population you think is deeply interested, or considerably interested, in the proposals put forward?—My answering to that would have to be limited to the part of the country that I know, the Central Provinces. So far as I can form an estimate of the feeling of the people there, I should say that the educated classes are deeply interested in the proposals, but they form a very small minority of the population. There is also a substantial interest in the proposals amongst the property class and particularly the landed classes, but the great masses of the people, the aboriginals, the labouring classes, I think, as yet, have been hardly touched at all in regard to political education, and I think have no interest, no opinion really, and no knowledge of the reform proposals.

2252. Speaking broadly, what you would say was the percentage of the class to whom you refer, who have an interest, to the whole population?—It is very difficult to put it in the form of a percentage, but I should estimate very roughly that something between 10 and 20 per cent. of the population had a knowledge and was interested in the reform scheme. That would be an outside estimate of the number.

2253. Would it fairly correspond to the electorate as compared with the total population?—Oh, no; the electorate is a smaller proportion.

2254. Now with regard to special representation and communal representation, do you put the special and communal representation on the same footing?—No.

2255. It is quite a different question?—It is quite a different question.

2256. Special representation might be adopted, and is adopted, in certain of our western constitutions; communal is not?—That is so.

2258. Do you think that University representation can subsist at all on that basis?—That was my opinion, and the opinion of the Committee.

2259. It would be quite new as compared with our University representation?—Yes, I recognise there is no real parallel between the proposals put forward in the Franchise Report for University representation in India with the corresponding University representation in Great Britain.

2260. In my own constituency I have 29,000 electors. That is a very different thing from the small body of the Senate?—Yes. I believe the object of the Franchise Committee in recommending University representation, was that the special interests of University education and of education in general, should be able to put forward their views with regard to educational matters in the Legislative Councils.

2261. With regard to the women's vote, you say that the witnesses who came before you all thought that it was necessary to have special machinery to make it effective?—Yes.

2262. Did you hear Mrs. Naidu, who said she gave up that for the present—that she would like to see it established as a principle even without the machinery?—When Mrs. Naidu appeared as a witness before us on behalf of the All-India Women's Deputation, she herself pressed for special arrangements for recording the votes of women, and admitted that if such special arrangements were not made there would be large sections of women that would be unable to exercise the privilege given to them.

2263. I have no doubt Mrs. Naidu still holds that opinion, but she said in her evidence, "If you say that in this experimental stage it would complicate matters to have a separate polling booth, do not have a separate polling booth"?—Yes.

2264. Do you think that a large number will agree with that? Do you think many of those who are advocating the vote would accept it without any special machinery?—I cannot speak for them, but what I do feel is that if a woman's vote is given without some special electoral arrangements to assist them in recording that vote you will give a vote to a number of electors which they will be unable to exercise.

2265. In fact, it will be a bit of camouflage?—Yes, and also I believe that it will be considered unjust by certain sections of the population whose women would not be able to record the vote, whilst other sections of the population would be able to record it.

2266. You said, I think, that you made a rough shot that 10 or 20 per cent. of the population of the Central Provinces was interested in this question?—Yes; and I should like to add that, on a little reflection, I consider that a very outside estimate. I think it is much nearer 10 per cent. than 20 per cent.

2268. Certainly; but parts of the Provinces are very primitive?—Yes.

2269. Would you say that the percentage of the population interested in this question is increasing?—Yes.

2270. Rapidly?—Yes.

2270A.—Supposing you wanted it to increase, supposing you would like it to increase, how would you set about increasing it?—I believe that the introduction of the first stage of responsible government embodied in the Bill must necessarily lead to a very rapid and extended interest of all classes in political matters. If you give them a vote and bring home to them that their vote is really a responsible vote, I think that must be the strongest educative influence in political matters that can be applied.

2271. Now I want to ask you a question, as a civil servant. As far as my memory serves me, you are the first civil servant who has appeared before this Committee other than members of the Government of India. Would it be fair to say that a certain amount of the hostility to the Civil Service which you spoke about, which has shown itself of recent years, is possibly due to a belief that the Civil Service were hostile to a reform of this character?—I do not think that would be a fair statement, and, if I might put forward my own view, I think that Mr. Madhav Rao's sequence of events was wholly inaccurate. I think that hostility to the Service, criticism of the Service, occurred in point of time substantially before there was any opinion evinced in the Service against reforms. I think his historical sequence was incorrect.

2272. Would you like to express an opinion—I do not want to press it if you would rather not—as to the attitude of the Civil Service, or of yourself as a civil servant?—I am in no way authorised to express any opinion in regard to the Service, and the only thing

Mr. Montagu—continued.

I could give would be my own personal impression of what I believe the attitude of the Service to be. In doing that I would like to distinguish, if possible, between their attitude towards political reforms and their attitude as to the effect of those reforms on their own personal interests. So far as the first part is concerned, my own belief is that the large majority, the very large majority, of the members of the Indian Civil Service loyally accept the pronouncement of August 20th in regard to responsible government. So far as regards the road by which that is to be carried out, there is a section of opinion amongst Indian civil servants who believe, and honestly believe, that the proposals embodied in the Joint Report go further than is desirable at the present stage of Indian conditions. I think their attitude also has been modified to a certain extent by the fact of the publication of the Report. Having been published, many recognise now, whatever may be the conditions in India, it would be exceedingly difficult to grant reforms that would be substantially less than those which have received the imprimatur of the Secretary of State and the Viceroy. There is another body of opinion in the Civil Service, I believe, that does not consider the extent of the reforms advocated in the Joint Report is excessive, but believe that it goes along the wrong road—that is, that the diarchy part of the proposals will make it much more difficult to work towards the goal satisfactorily than if that had been departed from. There is a third section of opinion amongst the Service, I think, which feels that the scheme advocated in the Report is justified on its merits, and that, having been published, there is no satisfactory alternative to it. So far as the personal interests of the Services are concerned, I believe that they have been genuinely frightened by the extent of the public criticism to which they have been subjected in recent years, and they fear that even with the best will on their part, and with their intense desire to co-operate in making the scheme a success, it may be very difficult for them to do so owing to racial prejudice and owing to the public statements that have occurred in speeches reported in the Press of India, as evidenced, I think, by the statement that Mr. Madhav Rao made before this Committee. It is on that ground that they desire to have certain safeguards in regard to their position in the Services. That is my personal view. I am only trying to interpret what I believe to be the opinion of the Services.

2273. Which of the three categories do you belong to yourself?—I belong to the last.

2274. I am going to put to you a question that is of great importance to me, and again I say do not answer it unless you like: Supposing you were a young man—a younger man than you are—seeking a career, would you enter the Indian Civil Service under this scheme?—Undoubtedly, and I very much regret that my services are coming to an end rather than starting.

2275. There are really before this Committee three main schemes at the present moment—two are closely related—the original scheme embodied in the Report, the scheme as modified by the Government of India, and the alternative scheme put forward by five heads of the Governments?—Yes.

2276. Would you express to us your opinion of the relative merits of those alternative proposals as they strike you?—I am opposed to the scheme put forward by the Local Governments, because I believe that it is more likely to result in breakdown than the scheme embodied in the Bill. It seems to me that if you have a scheme under which the Minister is to be responsible for every decision of the Government, that must bring the Minister into much more frequent conflict with the Legislative Council than the other scheme does, and I believe under that scheme the position of the Minister would be almost untenable, and would frequently lead to deadlocks in the Government. The point that I would like to emphasise is that, whilst I recognise all the difficulties of diarchy, I think there must be separate responsibility in some form; but, having got separate responsibility, I would like to see a Government as unified as possible.

2277. And as regards the Government of India's modifications?—My personal opinion with regard to the general line of the Government of India's modifications fications, is that it would be undesirable to accept them. I feel myself that if the scheme is to work successfully in India it is essential to have good co-operation between the official and the non-official elements in India, and I doubt very much whether you would get any real co-operation by the non-officials under the scheme advocated by the Government of India. I should like to say that there is even amongst my own Service, I know, a certain volume of opinion—I cannot say it is large—that believes the danger under this scheme is in part due to the numerous safeguards included in the scheme. I say it may be a very small section of my own Service, but some at least believe that the scheme would be more workable if the safeguards were perhaps less.

2278. Could you suggest some of the safeguards that that section of your Service would prefer to see left out? Could you give an instance?—I do not know that I have ever discussed with members of the Service the particular safeguards to be left out, but I have heard some responsible members of the Service say that if their services are to be transferred to a Minister they would rather, for their own safety, be placed entirely under that Minister, without any outside safeguards which might lead to friction, and might cause ill-feeling between the Service and the Minister. I would like to emphasise the fact that I believe that section of opinion is exceedingly small.

2279. It was safeguards of that kind that you were referring to, rather than Grand Committees and that sort of thing?—Yes. I was discussing the matter purely with Service men concerned with Service interests at the time.

2280. I have one more question to ask you. I think you have attended most of the meetings of this Committee?—Several of them.

2281. You have heard a considerable amount of evidence?—Yes.

2282. Very many of the deputations which have been represented so far before us have urged various alterations in the Bill, extensions of it?—Yes.

2283. You may have heard of some of those before, in India, or in the newspapers?—Yes.

2284. Would you join in advocating any of them?—I do not think I would like to reply generally to the question unless I were given specific instances; but so far as any general answer can be given, I believe the Bill, as drafted, embodies a liberal measure of advance at this stage towards responsible government, and I should hesitate very considerably before recommending any further advances at this stage.

2285. May I ask you on two cases as examples? It has been urged before us—I think I put this question to Sir James Meston—that the Budget should be voted under the Government of India, just as it is in the Provinces, with power of restoration. Would you assent to that?—I think not at the present stage.

2286. It has been urged upon us that when the numerical limits of the Executive Council of the Government of India is removed there should be three Indian members rather than the two suggested in the scheme. What would you say to that?—I should like to ask is that question put on the supposition that there is likely to be an increase in the number of members of the Government of India? If the Government of India is constituted as at present, with the existing number of members, I think again, at the present stage, that two Indians instead of one would be a substantial advance, sufficient until the first Parliamentary Commission.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

2287. Speaking of the communal feeling which has been roused by these proposals, did any such feeling manifest itself over the Morley-Minto proposals?—None whatever, so far as I know.

2288. The feeling which has been roused is due to a sense that very much larger issues are involved?—Yes.

2289. Do you think that the magnitude of the subjects which are proposed to be transferred under the Montagu-Chelmsford scheme is appreciated by the vast mass of Indian subjects?—By the vast mass of Indian opinion, certainly not.

2290. Take the classes who you state are interested in them at present, do you think they fully appreciate the magnitude of the transfer which it is proposed should take place?—I doubt it. I do not think that even some of the politicians realise the very great volume of Government business and power which will be granted to them by the transfer of the subjects recommended by the Functions Committee.

2291. Do you think that can be realised until the Assemblies have actually met, and found what they may have to deal with?—No.

2292. And still more, I suppose, any questions which might be brought up at elections will be in their infancy—questions on which there may be difference of opinion will hardly have developed?—I think not—not for some years.

2293. Is it your opinion that the majority of the questions in which public opinion may become interested will involve finance?—Undoubtedly.

2294. There is no considerable financial margin at present in the Provincial Budgets, is there?—No.

2295. Therefore, if any considerable extra expenditure is involved there must be increased taxation?—Yes.

2296. Have you ever seen any scheme responsibly put forward for largely diminishing expenditure?—I have seen many schemes put forward by Indian politicians—perhaps not schemes, but criticisms of particular Departments as being extravagant, and of it being possible to save substantial sums out of the existing expenditure; but I honestly believe that those are wholly illusory. Further, I believe that under a system of the Joint Purse, where the non-official element is brought into close touch with the finance of the reserved Departments, they themselves will clearly realise, when they get into touch with the details, that any large savings are impossible.

2297. You were a member of the Royal Commission on the Public Services?—Yes.

2298. And you also presided over a Commission to inquire into the Roads and Bridges Department of Public Works?—Yes.

2299. You have had an opportunity of estimating in those capacities the work of others than the Indian Civil Service?—Of other Services in India, yes.

2300. What has been your general experience of administration by others than the Indian Civil Service; has it been more economical than that of the Civil Service?—So far as economy is concerned, I would say certainly not.

2301. There are many admirable skilled Indian engineers in the Public Works Department. Are works carried out by them more economically than those carried out by the engineers who are recruited from this country?—If I understand your question aright, it is whether the work carried out by the Public Works Department of the Government is more or less economical than the work carried out by public contractors for private individuals?

2302. No. There is an infusion of Indian-born engineers in the Public Works Department?—Yes.

2303. It has been pressed upon us that there ought to be a much larger infusion. What has been your experience of the economy of works carried out by Indians rather than by British engineers? Is the one superior to the other, or do you see any change in economy?—I think not. The works of the Public Works Department are always carried out on a schedule of rates fixed for the district which, so far as I am aware, does not vary in any way as to whether there is a British engineer in charge or an Indian engineer in charge. I think they both do their best to carry out the work as economically as they can.

2304. Have you any fear of a lapse in economy if there is a large transfer of services of various descriptions from the present hands to a Legislative Assembly, or to the nominees of a Legislative Assembly?—A lapse in economy? That there would be more extravagance in administration?

2305. Have you a fear that they will be more extravagant?—No, I have none. The fear, if there is any, is not that they will be extravagant, but that the standards may perhaps be lowered.

2306. Do

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

2306. Do you think the trend of elections in India in local matters has been towards economy?—Whether local bodies in India manage their concerns with reasonable economy—is that the question?

2307. There has been considerable transfer in India, in the last 30 years, of municipal powers to municipal authorities—elective authorities?—Yes.

2308. Have they been, on the whole, more economical than the previous authorities?—In my own Province, of which alone I have any intimate knowledge, the works carried out by the municipal authorities and district authorities, local bodies, have largely been carried out on their behalf by the Public Works Department, because they have no separate machinery to carry out big works. So far as small works are concerned, which have been done by their own staff, I certainly do not think that they have been carried out any more economically as regards expenditure than would have been done by the Public Works Department.

2309. What I really want to arrive at is this: The result of popular election in Europe is not always economical. Do you not think that there may be considerable difficulty on the part of representatives in these new Legislative Assemblies in resisting the demands for what would seem to you extravagant expenditure on services which may be in themselves very desirable? Will there not be great difficulty in getting the Budget in hand?—On the general principle I doubt very much whether there will be any tendency towards more general extravagance, but so far as one can prophesy in regard to the future, I am inclined to believe that the object, the desire of the future Councils in India, will be to spend more sums on some branches of the administration and less sums on others; that there will be a difference in the point of view taken by the largely increased Indian element in the Councils from what has hitherto been the point of view of the Government.

2310. I gather it is your view that finance is one of the questions on which a strong hold must be kept in the interests of India itself?—Yes.

2311. And therefore those who ask for full responsible government at once really lose a very valuable check. Do you know the system of British Local Government at all? Are you aware that there are checks kept on the expenditure of muncipal authorities by the Central Government—by the Local Government Board?—Yes, I have some knowledge of that system.

2312. Do you think it would be unreasonable, at all events for some time, to have a similar check by the Central Government, or by the Governor, on expenditure tending to be excessive?—I think it would be very undesirable in the interests of India if Provinces were to be subject to such detailed checks and control as local bodies in England are subject to by the Local Government Board. So far as the Bill is concerned, there are already embodied in it several provisions which act as safeguards, checks in regard to the management of the finances by the Legislative Councils, and I think that those safeguards are adequate.

2313. Subject to financial considerations, I gather you do not in any case favour the scheme of the five heads of Government, but that you would prefer the Government of India's scheme as regards finance. You do not like the division of the Budget into two parts?—That is so.

2314. You think there must be one Budget?—Yes.

2315. Can you tell us how, if there is to be one Budget, you can arrive at that unless by the Governor's veto? Do you think that the setting up of any form of Committee, with a view to the Legislative Council's decision, will have the same force as the Governor's veto?—As I visualise the work of the Budget under the scheme embodied in the Bill, there will be joint deliberation by both halves of the Government in the preparation of the Budget; there will be certain obligatory items of expenditure which must be made. There will then be a certain balance available for other expenditure. I contemplate that the joint deliberation of the Government will ordinarily arrive at an amicable settlement as to what purposes that money shall be devoted to. So far as the Legislative Council is concerned, if their action is found to be impossible from a financial point of view I think the safeguards in the Bill are sufficient control over them.

2316. Would you have favoured a more simple division of power; would you have regarded it as possible, apart from finance, to retain certain powers entirely in the hands of the Governor and to, so to speak, allow the Ministers to deal even more freely than is proposed with a less number of subjects. Would you have regarded that as a feasible alternative?—So far as the proposals for the transfer of subjects are concerned at present, I think the Minister is put into a position of substantial responsibility, but not of complete responsibility. I do not believe that a system could be worked in India, under present conditions, under which certain subjects would be wholly free from all control by the Central Government or any superior authority, and other subjects would be wholly under the control of the central authority or governor. It does not seem to me to be a feasible scheme under which you are going to have the functions of the Government divided absolutely to the extent that one-half may carry out wholly at their pleasure, and the other half may carry out wholly at their pleasure.

2317. Whatever form this Bill takes ultimately, what is the period you yourself would favour for reviewing it?—I am certainly opposed to the recommendation made in the Report that there should be an opportunity for a review of the system at the end of five years. I would like to see no less period than that stated for the Parliamentary Commission which is, I believer, 12 years, and will give experience of the work of at least three Legislative Councils. If I have not made myself clear, I meant to suggest that I consider there should certainly be no possibility of review, or further expansion, under a period of less than 12 years, and then by a Parliamentary Commission.

Lord Sinha.

2318. It is 10 years in the Bill?—Yes, and about two years deliveration—it will be about 12 years before a change will be introduced.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

2319. Do you think that under any circumstances, if a period like 10 years is fixed, that Indian opinion will fix itself upon the work to be done, and not on fresh concessions to be obtained during the 10 years?—I hope very much that Indian opinion will fix itself upon the work to be done, because I think they will be shrewd enough to see, and the services will be shrewd enough to see, that whatever further advance is to be made will be based on work done.

2320. I suppose you hold that further concessions will depend largely on the use made of the existing powers?—Undoubtedly.

Mr. Acland.

2321. With regard to the Franchise, you said at the previous meeting, if I remember rightly, that you thought the Provincial Governments might have managed to administer, in some cases, a wider Franchise than is actually proposed, and you have said to-day that the wider the Franchise no doubt, within certain limits, the greater the security against undue influence?—Yes.

2322. But considering the power of extending the Franchise from time to time, as experience shows to be desirable, do I gather that you are personally satisfied that you are beginning in each case with a Franchise as wide as can reasonably be expected?—The answer to which you refer was, I believe, limited to the case of one specific Province, the Punjab, and there I expressed my personal view only, that I thought the Local Government could have carried out an election with a larger electorate than is provided in the proposals, but at the same time the Local Government would not guarantee to carry out the election on any wider basis of Franchise, and therefore I think it would have been unsafe, at least for me, to force my personal opinion against the Government's.

2323. And if you were in charge you would be content to begin with that restricted Franchise, knowing that it could be extended?—If I were in charge of the Punjab?

2324. Yes?—I find it very difficult to say. I would rather not give an opinion, if you do not mind, because I do not know the conditions of the Punjab sufficiently intimately to be able to state with any confidence.

2325. You

2325. You were asked several questions about the financial arrangements, and you told us that you were opposed to the proposal of a separate purse?—Yes.

2326. Am I right in drawing the impression that you said you accepted the proposal that for further taxation the responsibility should rest on the Minister?—No. So far as that proposal is concerned, the recommendation that I wish to make to the Committee is that taxation should be imposed only after joint deliberation by the whole Government, but that each half of the Government should have the right to make proposals for further taxation for its own needs. I think it would be wrong to restrict the official half of the Government so that they would have no power of proposing taxation to the Legislative Council.

2327. In other words, you would suggest that the question of taxation should be the composite result of Cabinet decision—a unified Cabinet decision representing both branches?—I wish it to be the result of the joint deliberation of the whole Cabinet; but I wish to have separate responsibility on the Minister for the taxation required to meet his policy, and separate responsibility on the official Government for any further taxation required to meet their policy.

2328. You want to see within the Cabinet a certain discretion for the respective branches in regard to their respective services?—Yes.

2329. I am accurately interpreting you there?—Yes.

2330. I should like to carry this point further, because it is very important. As regards the actual proposals of the Legislature would you desire to see the ordinary procedure conducted in India as we understand it in England, and as it is practised in England—namely, that in matters of finance the Chancellor of the Exchequer deals with the whole of that matter, investigates it, and then puts forward his proposals, if more money is wanted, to the Cabinet. The Chancellor of the Exchequer then in turn is the exponent of the policy to the Legislature, and not an individual Minister holding another portfolio?—That is so.

2331. Is that what you would desire to see carried out in India—something on those lines? The Finance Member would be the Minister undertaking the actual introduction and proposal to the Legislature?—For additional taxation?

2332. Yes, and all matters connected with the Budget?—I would like to see in India each half of the Government responsible before the Legislative Council for any proposals for taxation that are put before that Council. I would not like to see a separate Finance Minister responsible for the taxation of both halves of the Government.

2333. I am looking at it to see how it would work in practice. You would like to see a Minister—the Minister for Education—assuming for the time being the position of Finance Minister, introducing taxation to the Council; but before he does that he has got to get the whole of the financial knowledge and all the pros and cons connected with it. Would he not have to go to the Finance Department for that?—To take the illustration of education, if there is to be any very large extension of education, for instance, the introduction of a measure for compulsory education involving very largely increased expenditure, under the ordinary conditions in India, that would be embodied in a Bill which would lay down firstly the conditions under which compulsion could be exercised, and, secondly, would contain clauses providing for the raising of funds by taxation for the amount it was estimated it would cost.

2334. That would be a very unusual course, would it not, having regard to our procedure here?—Yes.

2335. You would like to see that introduced in India? Do not you see obvious difficulties if that were so?—That is the system at present in force in India.

2336. Do you think it is a good one, that the expansion of a Department is to depend upon the individual taxation which will be levied by that Department?—Not wholly responsible, certainly not. On this matter they will say: "The estimated increase of expenditure on education is so much; a portion of that can be met out of the ordinary revenues of the country; for the balance we will impose a local tax under the Bill."

2337. And for the time being the Minister for Education becomes the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and asks the Council to accept his proposal to that extent?—Yes, after joint deliberation by the whole Cabinet in the subject; he is in possession of the views of the Cabinet on the subject.

Lord Sinha.

2338. You are familiar with Clause 9 of the Bill?—Yes.

2339. "Provided that (a) The Local Government shall have power, in relation to any such resolution, to act as if it had been assented to, notwithstanding the withholding of such assent, if the resolution relates to a reserved subject, and the Governor certifies that the expenditure provided for by the resolution is essential to the discharge of his responsibility for the subject." That is Proviso (a) to Clause 9 with regard to reserved subjects?—Yes.

2340. That is considered a very fundamental part of the scheme of the Joint Report by Indian opinion, namely, that they should have the power subject only to the Governor's right to alter it?—Yes.

2341. You heard Sir James Meston's evidence, did you not?—Partly.

2342. Namely that that should be altered; Proviso (a) should be altered so that the Legislative Council should only have the power, which they have now, merely to recommend with regard to reserved subjects?—Yes.

2343. Do you agree with that view yourself?—No. I consider that the power of restoration given by the Proviso to the Governor is sufficient to secure reasonable financial facilities for reserved subjects, but I would like to add that this power of restoration will be, I hope, a living power, not merely a nominal one.

2344. I suppose you also hope that the Legislative Council will not refuse to pass allotments unreasonably?—Yes, certainly.

2345. Now with regard to the attitude of the Civil Service, you have described certain sections as holding certain opinions. May I take it that the Civil Service, as a body, is convinced that there must be a substantial reform in the sense of popularising the Government?—Yes.

2346. And the only difference of opinion between them is as to the particular method by which that popularising is to be obtained?—And to its extent.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).] We are much obliged to you for your evidence.

(The Witness is directed to withdraw.)

Mr. RICHARD FEETHAM and Mr. H. L. STEPHENSON, C.S.I., C.I.E., are called in; and Examined, as follows:—

2347. You were members of Lord Southborough's Functions Committee?—(Mr. Feetham.) I was Chairman of the Functions Committee, and Mr. Stephenson was a member. Lord Southborough was President of the whole Inquiry.

2348. You have laid before us in a memorandum your criticism of the Government of India's views on your Report, and we have those before us?—Yes. (See Appendix F.)

2349. Is there any particular point in that memorandum to which you want to direct specially the attention of the Committee?—No; I do not know that there is any point in the memorandum itself to which I particularly wish to refer now. I think that the memorandum, with regard to the points raised by the Government of India, speake for itself.

2350. I will not ask you to go through it paragraph by paragraph, because we have it before us; but if there is any particular subject on which you wish to make a statement first of all before you are examined we should like to hear it?—There are one or two preliminary liminary points that I should be glad to mention, and one or two matters, I think, it might be convenient to clear up. I do not think it is necessary for me to make any statement about the procedure of the Committee. That is partly covered by what Lord Southborough has said. Our procedure and the material upon which we had to go appear from the terms of the Report itself. I should like to draw attention to the fact that our reference involved a consideration of two distinct problems: First, the question of the division of the functions of Government between the Central Government and the Provincial Governments, and, secondly, the division within the Provinces of the functions of the Provincial Government into two classes, reserved and transferred. In connection with the first problem, we had to advise as to the powers of control, which should be retained by the Government of India in relation to Provincial subjects. In connection with the second, we had to advise as to the power which should be exercised by the Governor in Council in relation to transferred subjects. Certain paragraphs of the Joint Report were specially prescribed for our guidance, and the two illustrative lists were commended to our consideration. Apart, of course, from those paragraphs and those lists we had to take the Joint Report and the scheme which it set out, as our basis, we could only deal with the question in relation to the scheme set forth in the Joint Report. As to the composition of the Commtttee, as this Committee is aware, the Committee consisted of three members of the Indian Civil Service, and three Indian gentlemen, and myself as Chairman. Of the three Indian gentlemen, one was a Mohammedan and the other two were Hindoos. Now it will be seen that our Report is a unanimous Report, subject to certain notes of dissent, which appear in the body of the Report itself. They are very few in number. I do not know that I need specially refer to them; the Committee have them in mind; but there is one paragraph, which, though not a paragraph of dissent, is a paragraph expressing the desire that the Committee might have arrived at another conclusion, to which I think I ought to refer, as it has been referred to in evidence which has already been given here. I am referring to paragraph 46 of the Report, which states the views of three of the members of the Committee on the subject of land revenue. The three members of the Committee are Sir C. H. Setalvad, Dr. Sapru, and Sir Rahim Bakhsh. It was urged that land revenue administration and irrigation should together be made transferred subjects in Bombay, subject, in the case of the last named, Sir Rahim Bakhsh, to the exception of Scinde. They did not formally dissent on the point, but, as will be seen in that paragraph they recorded their desire for transfer in the special case of Bombay, and they expressed their earnest hope that in the next revision of the constitution the whole question would be thoroughly investigated with a view to making land revenue administration a transferred subject, not merely in Bombay, but in the rest of the Provinces. This paragraph, I notice, is referred to in the Memorandum put in on behalf of the All-India Conference of the Moderate Party. It is referred to in paragraph 17 of the Memorandum, and it was also referred to in Mr. Banerjea's evidence. It has been suggested, I notice, that this paragraph was framed on the understanding that this thorough investigation to which it referred would take place at the end of five years, and reference has been made in this connection to the proposal in paragraph 260 of the Joint Report as to the Government of India hearing applications from either the Provincial Government or the Provincial Council for the modification of reserved and transferred lists of the Province after five years. I cannot, of course, say how far the expectation of reconsideration at the end of five years weighed with the members responsible for the paragraph in question in setting out their view as it is set out in that paragraph. I must say I did not myself take the next revision of the constitution as applying to the proposals for the interim consideration of the transfer of further subjects proposed in paragraph 260 of the Joint Report; but the paragraph must speak for itself, and its meaning is a question of interpretation. Apart from that paragraph, in the Moderate Memorandum, I noticed a passage in Mr. Banerjea's evidence to which I think I ought to refer, in which he says this. It is on page 71, Question 1333: "The Functions Committee make it quite clear that in regard to at least one important branch—namely, land revenue, which is now a reserved branch—their view would have been different if, instead of five years, the period of ten years had been fixed." The punctuation in the Minutes of Evidence is not quite clear, but that is how I understand it is intended to read. I am referring to what is called the Revised Copy. Mr. Banerjea no doubt had not got the Report before him when he made that remark in reply to a question, but it will be seen that that statement which I have just read from his evidence, as reported, goes quite outside the terms of the paragraph of our Report, and, so far as it goes outside the paragraph, it is mistaken. As this point has been raised as to the understanding or the expectation of a revision after five years, on the basis of which it is said, in the Memorandum to which I have already referred, the Moderate Memorandum, that the report of the Functions Committee was framed, I think I should say just this. According to my recollection, the discussions of the Functions Committee did not show that the prospect of revision of the list of transferred subjects at the end of five years was prominent in the minds of the members. But it is, of course, the plan recommended in paragraph 260 of the Joint Report. It had not been officially abandoned in any way at the time of our investigation; but, as far as I personally was concerned, I confess that I was inclined to assume that this proposal as to the five years' provision was unlikely eventually to be adopted.

2351. You look to a longer period?—Yes, I look to a longer period, and it seemed to me desirable that the transferred list which we had to prepare should be prepared on the basis that it would have finality until the first inquiry by a statutory Commission. That was my personal view.

2352. Is there any other point you would like to bring forward?—I think the only other point I need refer to now is as to the question of the lists which are included in the Report of the Functions Committee, and on which a number of detailed criticisms have been made by the Government of India. Those criticisms are discussed in the Memorandum which Mr. Stephenson and myself have signed, and of which the Committee has a copy.

2353. What paragraph?—Part II. of the Memorandum, page 11. I should like to call attention to a statement we have made there, a statement to the effect that we anticipated, as appears from paragraph 13 of the Report, that these lists would require some amendment in the light of Government criticism when received. That refers to the lists of All-India and Provincial subjects. I should draw a distinction between those lists and the list of transferred subjects. The various amendments proposed by the Government of India, which are subsequently discussed in a later portion of our Memorandum, have been the subject of consideration and discussion in a Committee of the India Office, of which I have been a member, or the meetings of which I have attended, and as a result of those discussions certain amendments have been introduced, and revised lists have been prepared in which some of the points raised by the Government of India are met by changes which are mostly changes of detail. I have here those revised lists, and it may be convenient that I should hand them in.

Mr. Montagu.] If I might make an explanation at this stage, we refer in our deliberations to this Reforms Committee, but it has never appeared on record. It is an informal committee of fluctuating composition presided over by Mr. Charles Roberts, which has been sitting for the last year and a half with a view to advising the India Office about the various documents which appear either in this country or in India in order that we may concert the evidence which we should lay before this Committee, or the attitude we should take up as a Government on this Committee. It seems to me that this list, as modified by that Committee, would be a suitable basis for discussion in this Committee, and therefore I should be very glad if Mr. Feetham could be allowed to hand it in.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

2354. I think the Committee would like to have it. Perhaps you will hand it in?—Yes. I have here copies of of two lists, as revised. (See Appendix.) I have also copies showing the actual alterations introduced in the lists as proposed by the Functions Committee.

2355. Do you wish to say anything more in examination in chief?—No. Perhaps I ought to say that these amendments, which have been introduced in the revised lists, have my personal concurrence. I have been a party to the discussions at which they were made, and we recognised that those lists would be subject to revision in detail. I think the amendments now introduced are improvements, and may be regarded generally as carrying out in clearer terms the intentions of the Functions Committee.

Mr. Montagu.

2356. I only propose to refer incidentally to the paper which you have handed in. I gather that the alterations which have been made have been almost entirely explanatory, and very largely drafting alterations?—Yes.

2357. There is no difference in principle between this list and the old list?—I think that is correct. There are minor adjustments which I could deal with in detail so far as the Committee wish, but I do not want to go into the details unnecessarily.

2358. Can you draw our attention to the most important ones?—If I may take the copy which shows the amendments approved by the India Office Reforms Committee. Those amendments are distinguished in the copy I have before me by italics where words have been added, and by brackets where words have been omitted.

2359. I have not that copy before me. I will postpone that question for the moment. I would like to ask you something about another point which is made by many critics of the work of the Functions Committee, that except for two or three very minor points there is no differentiation beween the Provinces. I think I am right in saying that you recommend the transfer of Forests in Bombay, that you make certain special reservations in Assam, and that for a particular reason you make a specific reservation in Bengal, except for those three things, the list of reserved and transferred subjects is, I think, the same in all Provinces?—Yes.

2360. Would you mind accounting for that a little?—When I first approached the subject of this Inquiry I expected that we should find we ought to make greater differentiation between the Provinces in the transferred list than we have made. When we came to deal with the subject it was difficult to distinguish in detail the conditions of the different Provinces in such a way as to justify different conclusions as to transfer. There was a very obvious difference between Assam and the other Provinces, mainly due to the condition of things illustrated by the large map which is included in the Blue Book giving the views of the different Local Governments on the scheme of the Joint Report, and which shows how the backward territory in Assam is arranged. The more advanced portions of the Province consist of two valleys, which are separated from one another, and hedged in by hilly country, where, speaking generally, the population is backward, and where it was contemplated that special provisions would have to be made on the lines of the proposals contained in the Joint Report as to excluded areas, and the existence of that special condition of things in Assam, as explained in our Report, led us to reserve certains subjects in that Province which are transferred in other Provinces. That was a clear case. Generally speaking, as I say, it was difficult to find conditions which justified different conclusions as to transfer, and we were faced with this difficulty, it was clear from the evidence before us that distinctions made in favour of one Province and against another, where there was not some clear case that could be pointed out, were certain to cause difficulty. The Province which did not get as much would consider that some slight had been put upon it, and conditions would be produced favourable to agitation and unrest until the change had been made putting it on the same footing as the more favoured Province. We felt, therefore, that unless there was a good case it was undesirable to make the differentiation. At the same time we felt that an automatic differentiation would result owing to the different stages of political development reached in the different Provinces. In the more advanced Provinces the Legislative Council would be in a position to exercise greater influence over the administration of the Province. As the Council became more representative in character, and acquired greater political experience, this influence would, in the natural course of things, be increasingly recognised both by the official Government of the Province and by the Government of India..

2361. My next question is about land revenue. Can you tell me why it was that your Committee rejected the proposal to transfer land revenue in any Province?—Yes. That is, of course, a question which raises a number of issues. As will be remembered, land revenue is specially referred to in the Joint Report on this question of transfer, and it is suggested there that it is not a subject which will be suitable for transfer at the first stage. That view, I think, was, speaking generally, the view of the Committee. Some members, as I have already mentioned, urged the transfer of land revenue in Bombay on the ground that the conditions in Bombay were special. One reason for not transferring land revenue mainly affects the Provinces which are not ryotwari, that is Provinces where the questions of landlord and tenant are very important; it was felt that until these new Councils had been elected, and until some experience had been obtained of their work, and of the way in which parties and interests would be represented, it was inadvisable to bring that subject into the political arena. In the case of other Provinces where those considerations did not apply, the transfer of land revenue was, of course, a very big question; it would involve a far-reaching change; and it was thought that at the outset such a far-reaching change should not be introduced until experience had been gained as to the working of this reform scheme. But apart from that there was this consideration, that the present system of dealing with land revenue is a system which is peculiarly unsuited to conditions of Parliamentary control. The settlement of a district except where the permanent settlement prevails, as the Committee knows, is revised from time to time; a district or a portion of a district is taken, and an elaborate report is made and the assessment is made afresh. And this is done in accordance with rules and principles which are, I believe, well understood by those who do the work. They are elaborated in great detail, but it is done simply by the authority of an Executive order. It seems to me, and I think it seemed to other members of the Committee, that it would be very difficult to ask a Parliamentary body to deal with the question of land revenue as long as it depended, to the extent it does to-day, on executive order, that is as long as the re-assessment of particular areas depended simply on an executive order and not on legislation. To alter that arrangement of dependence on executive order by requiring a separate Bill to be introduced wherever there was a re-assessment would, I think, obviously be an undesirable plan, because it would set the interests of one district against another, and it would be inviting a popular body to do work which a popular body is not by its nature fitted to do. If I may express my personal opinion, it seems to me that before the land revenue could be regarded as a subject suitable for transfer its administration must be put far more on a statutory basis than it is to-day. In some Provinces there are Statutes governing in very general terms the arrangements about land revenue and the conditions as to re-assessment; in other Provinces there are no Statutes at all. Until the matter has been more fully dealt with by Statute it seems to me that it is not a suitable subject for Parliamentary control.

2362. Therefore, I take it that as all the subjects which you have reserved are destined as soon as may be to become transferred, you regard it as essential that the land revenue system should be investigated and modified?—I would prefer simply to say that I think it must be put much more fully than it is to-day on a statutory basis before it can be regarded as a subject ripe for transfer.

2363. My last question on this general point is this. You were bound strictly to complete a scheme in the preparation of which you had no share; did you form any views during your very limited work in India as to the scheme itself, as to its practicability and so forth?—Naturally —Naturally, I had some views during the time I was in India and subsequently. Do you wish me to state them?

2364. Would you wish to express them?—The view that I should like to express is this. My study of the subject has failed to satisfy me that there is any alternative scheme to the scheme of the Joint Report which is as promising a method of carrying out the terms of the pronouncement of the 20th August, 1917.

2365. I gather from the list you have handed in that you are unmoved by the big suggested alterations of the Government of India. You do not wish to divide education?—No. I adhere to the proposals of the report of the Committee, especially on this question of transfer. As I said, the other lists are subject to certain adjustments which have now been suggested. On the question of transfer I adhere to the recommendations of the Committee. I think it may fairly be said that in making those lists of subjects to be transferred at the outset the wisest course is to err on the side of liberality rather than on the other side. That is the point of view from which I dealt with the question. As I say, I think the scheme, with such lists of transferred subjects as we have proposed, is the most promising scheme for giving effect to the announcement of policy made.

2366. You never contemplated, apparently, a separate purse in the Provinces?—The position with regard to that is stated in one of the later paragraphs of the Report. We had before us at rather a late stage in our proceedings some proposals embodied in a Memorandum from Sir James Meston as to the adoption of what is called the separate-purse system, and the Committee stated in Paragraph 84 of their Report that they did not feel they were in a position to express any opinion upon those proposals. They neither accepted them nor rejected them. Their own proposals on the subject of finance were directed to working out the scheme on the basis laid down in the Joint Report in the way which seemed to them to be the most likely to prove satisfactory.

2367. You have had considerable knowledge and experience of constitution building in South Africa, have you not?—Well, I do not know that I can claim that I have had considerable experience in constitution building in South Africa. I have lived in South Africa for the greater part of the last seventeen years, during which time a great many constitutional changes have taken place in which I have been closely interested.

2368. You hold a position now under the South African Government, do you not?—I am a member of the South African Parliament.

2369. Were not you concerned either with the Bill for the Union of South Africa or one of the instruments of the present constitution of the Provinces in South Africa?—I was not directly concerned with the preparation of the Union Bill, though I was in South Africa when the whole thing was being discussed.

2370. What are your views about the separate purse now?—I recognise the strength of the case for providing an alternative to the joint-purse system. I am not satisfied that it would be a good plan to force a separate purse on all the Provinces at the start. I think it is true that the working of the joint purse may prove very difficult, and that in view of the difficulties that may arise in the working of the joint purse a way out should be provided. As far as my study of the question goes (the limits of which the Committee understand, because I was new to India when I went to take part in this inquiry), the view which I am disposed to take is that the best plan would be to provide machinery whereby a separate-purse plan could be adopted in any Province on the initiative of the Governor.

2371. If a separate purse was ever adopted in any Province would you contemplate taxation through a Grand Committee?—If you have a separate purse in accordance with the general idea of the Government of India scheme, and thereby the resources of the official side of the Government responsible for reserved subjects are definitely restricted, I think that they must have the necessary powers to get the funds that they require for the purpose of carrying on their administration. It may be that the resources assigned to them will prove insufficient, and if they should prove insufficient they must be in a position to get the additional revenue required.

(After a short adjournment.)

THE RIGHT HON. THE EARL OF SELBORNE IN THE CHAIR.

Sir Henry Craik.

2372. (To Mr. Feetham.) In your Memorandum of 16th July, 1919, Mr. Feetham, you deal very largely with the Education question and as to the extent of the transfer of education?—Yes.

2373. And you say that the large proportion of the evidence offered to you was about that?—With regard to the question of transfer, more attention was paid to that subject, or as much, as to all the others put together, I think we say.

2374. You found great difficulty in meeting the view of the Government of India that there should be a separation of parts of education?—Yes.

2375. You are opposed to that?—Yes.

2376. You think—and, if I may say so, I quite agree with you—that it is very difficult to divide primary and secondary education; they necessarily overlap, and they are part of the same machine?—Yes. It seemed to us that it was impossible to make any satisfactory division of the subject as a provincial subject.

2377. Primary education must be divided into education which is to end at primary education, and that sort of primary education which is only an introduction to secondary education?—Yes.

2378. Therefore you cannot divide primary education altogether, up to a certain point, as a separate subject?—No; but, as pointed out in this Memorandum, many of the secondary schools in India have primary departments, and thereby, so to speak, feed themselves with recruits from their own primary departments.

2379. That is so in India, as in other places?—Yes; but at the same time, as pointed out in this note, there is a stream of pupils from the primary schools to the secondary schools, and the primary schools therefore cannot be regarded as a self-contained unit.

2380. Besides, a large amount of primary education is carried on as preparation for higher education?—Yes.

2381. In that I quite agree with you, if I may say so. But, while opposing the division, do you not to a certain extent, in your own Memorandum and in your Report, give effect to it?—If we take the definition we have given of education as a Provincial subject, we separate off certain institutions. That, of course, is a comparatively simple process as long as the class of institution is not too wide, and this is very limited in class.

2382. What were the motives which made you suggest that separation?—The reason in the first case—that of the Benares Hindoo University—is that that does not belong to any Province.

2383. But it goes further than that. In the case of Bengal, for instance, for a period of five years you subject Provincial legislation to Indian legislation with regard to the whole control and organisation of education?—I was taking the points seriatim. I took the first point with regard to the All-India Universities. There is only one at present. Secondly, there is the question of the Chiefs' Colleges, which naturally goes with the work of the Central Government in relation to the Native States. Then there is the point which you mentioned with regard to Bengal. There we do not divide; we can hardly be said to divide the administration of education. We reserve legislation with regard to the Calcutta University, and with regard to the control and organisation of secondary education in Bengal to the Central Government to this extent, that the Provincial legislation on that subject must receive previous sanction, and that it is a subject on which in spite of any convention restricting the exercise by the Central Government of its power to legislate on Provincial subjects, on this part of education in Bengal the right of the Indian Legislature to legislate for a period of years is formally recognised. The reason for that is that there has been sitting for some time an important Commission presided over by Sir Michael Sadler to inquire into the Calcutta University, and incidentally dealing also with the question of the secondary education of Bengal. That Commission was appointed by the Government of India, and the Government of India have given undertakings with regard to carrying out by legislation the proposals of that Commission, in so far as they were arrived at unanimously. We were supplied with portions of the Report of that Commission, and it was apparent that the conditions of Bengal were special, and that provision should be made to enable the Government of India, through the Indian Legislature, to carry out the proposals of the Commission. That is as regards legislation. That does not mean that the Government of India will take over the administration of the Calcutta University and of secondary education in Bengal for that period. They may reserve to themselves certain powers during that period by the Bills they invite the Indian Legislature to pass, but it leaves education a Provincial subject for the purposes of administration, subject to any special powers which the Government of India may in these Bills think necessary for a period to reserve to themselves.

2384. Am I right in understanding that there is a separation made chiefly to keep free a path for any recommendation that may be made by the Commission presided over by Sir Michael Sadler?—Yes, to enable the reforms recommended by that Commission to be carried out by the Authority which appointed that Commission through its own Legislature.

2385. Surely that procedure is not quite proportionate to the object of a great national reform. Several suggestions are made on a large national basis, but I see you make a particular recommendation in order that, as I understand, the Report which may be made by the Commission may have the ground left free for it?—Yes.

2386. You are rather getting down to a different level?—I do not know that we are. As was mentioned just now, this is one of the points in which we have differentiated between Provinces, and we thought that there was a clear case for differentiation in this particular matter.

2387. Why in the case of Bengal more than any other?—It would probably be better for the Committee to have evidence about the condition of education in Bengal from Sir Michael Sadler or some member of the Commission. I would prefer not to sketch the special conditions existing there.

2388. There were dangers which you foresaw with regard to Bengal?—Certain troubles which existed, and which required strong measures to remedy.

2389. Taking education as a whole, which part of it do you think is most important in the interests of the whole population? Would you agree with me in saying that primary education is of far greater importance as an instrument for raising the people than any class of secondary education?—I feel great difficulty in discriminating, because primary education cannot exist apart from higher education.

2390. Surely the education which deals with the vast mass of the population is in itself a larger subject of government than merely when it deals with the higher or university education. It is a larger function of government?—It is inconceivable that you can have a satisfactory primary system with a bad higher education system, is it not?

2391. While they are essentially parts of one subject are there not certain distinctions which are especially important with regard to primary education and secondary education? Surely, with regard to primary education, the whole you want to do is to develop technical education, to modernise education, to make the people adaptable for their class in life as workmen and citizens, and for that they must to a large extent follow Western models for primary education if you are going to develop technical education?—I should hesitate very much to appear to dogmatise about educational development in India.

2392. On the other hand, with regard to secondary or higher university education, is it not there that you would much more develop the peculiar genius of the Indian people, and is it not there that you would rather leave free scope for the development of that genius on its own lines?—To-day the system of education which has been established under the British rule in India is a system which is inspired mainly from Western sources.

2393. Has not that been the great error of that higher education all through, that it has been developed from Western sources? Has not that been the cause of our failure in the past, from Macaulay downwards, that we have tried to develop that higher University education on Western models, and not to develop the peculiar genius of the Indian people?—I am not prepared to say; I should require——

2394. Have you not found that to be so when you were in contact with many of the most experienced education administrators? Did they not tell you that?—I cannot say.

2395. Some of them, at all events?—I was aware that such a view was held, but I cannot at present recall that any witness who appeared before us pressed that view upon us.

2396. It is presumptuous on my part to offer an opinion at all upon the subject, but surely anyone who is accustomed to Western schools, and the development of Western primary education, has been impressed when he has gone into these earlier schools in India, with their utter failure, to a large extent, to do the work which primary education is expected to do?—It was apparent from the evidence which was given before the Functions Committee that primary education to-day in India very largely failed of its objects, mainly, I think, owing to the fact that the teachers employed in primary schools had not had the training, and were not of the quality which was essential.

2397. I was impressed in any of the technical primary schools I went into by finding nothing higher than what would have been considered kindergarten work in our own schools here?—I was not able to go into the schools myself, speaking generally. I went into one or two.

2398. Surely, in that earlier education, what you want is the administration faculty, the habit of the administration faculty, and the development of the new, and admittedly rather Western, type of education, whereas in the case of the higher education you want the help of those who have rather studied the development of the higher genius of the Indian people?—No doubt you want those who have studied the native genius of the Indian people, but I think higher education, as things are now in India, must depend very largely on Western inspiration.

2399. I am very sorry to hear you say so, because it is very much against my own view, and very much against the hopes I have, although I am speaking only, as I say, as an ignorant person, but I speak with more confidence with regard to primary education, where I am certain that what is wanted is the higher administrative faculty. Do you think that instead of dividing those two, or attemping a division between higher and primary education, you could not manage to leave, as is done in this country, and in many countries who have attended largely to education, local independence in administration, but letting it all be subject to certain All-Indian regulations on the model of the administration of education in our own country, where you have the perfect freedom of local authorities, but at the same time a certain standard is maintained. Supervision is maintained by a Central Minister, and the legislative enactments are passed by Parliament?—I do not think you can put the Provincial authorities of India on the same level as the local authorities in this country. From the point of view of their status in the scheme of government they are on a much higher level.

2400. In the way of population?—They exercise to-day wider powers, although, of course, subject to a great deal of control from above, and they have greater responsibilities measured by population and area.

2401. But you do, even in your own Report, retain a certain supervision and control, a certain dominant control over parts, at all events, of education in the hands of the Indian Government?—Yes, we advise that University legislation shall be to a large extent in the hands of the Indian Legislature.

2402. Do you not think you might leave, equally both in the University and in primary education, a large measure of local control, only preserving in the hands of the Government of India those general regulations which in both spheres—not in secondary education alone, but in primary, I think, mor eessentially than in secondary—are necessary in connection with the power of supervision?—I think it would be very difficult to ask the Government of India to undertake the regulation of primary education—that is to say, the legislation that is necessary for primary education in all the Provinces of India. It would be regarded as a step back from the advance towards Provincial independence in Provincial matters.

2403. You could send out various inspectors or advisers who might take counsel with the various Provincial Governments to keep them all the same?—The fact that you have an Indian educational service can ensure contact and consultation and uniformity of principle, but to require uniformity of method, as your proposal, if I understand it aright, would mean, I cannot believe would be a good plan, and it would certainly make for slowness of movement.

2404. My suggestion is not identity of method, but simply that there should be a certain critical eye over the whole, so that while each Province should be allowed to pursue its own aims, it should have certain standards and be subject to certain criticisms by the Government of India?—Criticism is, of course, different to contro' · it may be most desirable that the Government of India should retain an Educational Commissioner, as it does to-day, who reports upon the education of all India.

2405. But, according to your proposals, that would come to an end so far as primary education is concerned?—No, I do not think our proposal involves that that should come to an end at all. There is nothing in our proposals that prevents the Government of India from maintaining a staff of skilled advisers. We do not propose that it should have power to force its own policy on the Provinces, but that it should still offer advice, and should still take an interest in the educational work in the Provinces—that is perfectly consistent, I think, with our proposals; there is every difference, of course, between control and advice.

2406. But you do propose placing in their hands a considerable control over that sphere of education, which, in my view, they are perhaps least fitted to deal with in the higher education?—We do; and one reason for that is that the maintenance of the standards of higher education appears to us to be a supremely important matter, and it seemed to us important to secure that university government should be on such a basis that the educational standards of universities should be maintained, and that you should not have a number of so-called university institutions which were not worthy of the name, and which lowered the whole status of universities in India.

2407. That is a detail which can be controlled and corrected, but you say that you are to maintain that authority, and you desire, I presume, that the Government of India should exercise it in the direction of maintaining Western ideals for the higher education?—It certainly was not one of the functions of my Committee to lay down education policy for the future.

2408. I thought you said you rather hoped it would be so?—You asked me whether I thought that higher education in India should be inspired from Eastern ideals, and I said that it must depend very largely, as things now are, on Western inspiration, That is my own personal opinion in reply to the question, but it was not one of the functions of my Committee to lay down the future educational policy of India. It was its business to suggest the constitutional arrangements under which that policy might be worked out.

2409. Just to sum up all that, I really want to ask you, do not you think instead of the division of parts of education it would be possible to give considerable Provincial freedom, maintaining in both, and especially with regard to primary education, a certain administrative supervision by the Government of India?—I feel great difficulty in conceiving any feasible scheme of administrative supervision for primary education involving the actual power of control by the Government of India.

Sir J. D. Rees.

2410. You came into this matter unencumbered by any previous predilections at all. It was quite new to you?—I was quite a stranger to India.

2411. Reading your Report and such of those other papers as I could glance at during the luncheon hour, I have the impression that your Committee found itself not only able to agree with the suggestion of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, but to go rather beyond it in regard to various questions. Am I right? I could give instances, if necessary, but I do not want to?—Are you thinking of our proposals for the transfer of subjects as mentioned in the illustrative list attached to the Report?

2412. Yes?—I would rather not deal with both at once. I think you referred especially to our transfer proposal?

2413. Chiefly?—You will see in the Joint Report and in the illustrative list attached to it—it was only, of course, an illustrative list and was not put forward as a recommendation—it was suggested that certain subjects should be divided, and that as to education, for instance, primary, secondary and technical education should be transferred, but that university education should be reserved. We came to the conclusion that that division was really not a possible division—there was very strong expert opinion to that effect—and that no other division such as that suggested between primary education and any other portion of the educational system was a desirable division. We advised that the whole of the subject of education as a Provincial subject should be transferred with those further recommendations to which Sir Henry Craik has referred about university education.

2414. So far as your answer goes, it confirms what I suggested?—In that case. Then you have forests and you have irrigation, and this illustrative list suggested some sort of division of those two subjects. We were satisfied that no division would be satisfactory, and in those two cases we recommended reservation, except as regards Bombay in the case of forests.

2415. Why did you make a difference in the case of forests between Bombay and, say, Madras?—I think our attitude towards that is stated in the note on the transferred list.

2416. I did not follow it, but I do not think it is necessary to follow it?—It was partly an experimental proposal.

2417. Why should the one be the body for the experiment and not the other?—I think it is difficult for me to go into it beyond the note that is contained in the list.

2418. Your Committee apparently, unlike the others, does not even include a Brahmin?—I think Dr. Sapru is a Brahmin.

2419. Is Mr. Couchman a representative of Madras?—Yes, in this sense, that he is a member of the Indian Civil Service from that Province.

2420. He produced a list of transferred subjects under duress from his Government, did he not, which acted under duress from the Government of India?—I do not think that is quite the position. Mr. Couchman did not produce the list of the transferred subjects proposed for Madras; the Madras Government produced the list, subject to the reservations and under the circumstances stated in the note.

2421. Did they not do that under the orders of the Government of India, and were they not very unwilling to do it themselves?—You will see exactly what they say in their own note which we quote in our Report.

2422. How far was the Government of India a party to this Report of yours, Section 2? Were they a party to it in any way?—They were not a party to our Report. You are referring to the Functions Committee Report?

2423. Yes?—We received valuable assistance from the Government of India in the form of the memoranda which are annexed to the Report, and with the proposals contained in which we deal.

2424. Did you send it in under the impression that they were generally agreeing with it?—I think I did my best to keep in touch with the views of different members of the Government of India, but until the Government of India had seen the Report I could not regard them as in any way committed to it.

2425. Did I rightly understand you to say just now that it was maintained that land revenue was a subject unsuited for Parliamentary control? Those are your own words I took down; did you mean Parliamentary control through the Government of India or what did you mean?—If I used that term "Parliamentary control," I meant control by a Parliamentary body in India. I was referring to the Provincial Legislative Councils.

2426. But you make it indirectly subject to Parliamentary control?—In this country?

2427. By reserving it as a reserved subject in India you make it to a certain extent the subject of Parliamentary control by the British Parliament?—As I say, I used the term "Parliamentary control," as I think I have made clear, and as the words show in relation to direct control by a Parliamentary body in India.

2428. You mean the Indian Parliament, surely?—The sort of control the British Parliament exercises over land revenue in India is by no means direct.

2429. I asked Sir James Meston some questions about Clause 23 of the Bill, which he said was under consideration. Have you taken time in considering it since, because I do not find anything indicating any change of view in the India Office about its items?—I am afraid I am not in a position to answer that question.

2430. This is a functions matter. In your Report, Paragraph 21, this sentence occurs: "It appears to be clear, therefore, that the sphere of influence of the new Provincial Councils will extend beyond the actual area of the transferred subjects." It appears to me to do so. Is that generally realised. In the evidence which has been given here it struck me that it was not?—That was a point to which the Committee attached considerable importance in considering what the effect was to be of putting a subject in the Provincial list. The conclusion stated in the sentence you quote is a conclusion drawn from a study of the scheme as set out in the Joint Report.

2431. You adhere to it?—Certainly.

2432. It is very important, is it not?—Very important.

2433. It does not appear to me from the evidence that it has been appreciated. I will ask you another question of the same character with regard to paragraph 33 on page 15: "The general effect of these proposals will be to leave the Provinces free to legislate without previous sanction on Provincial subjects whether, reserved or transferred, which are not specially made subject to Indian legislation." That remains correct?—Certainly that states the effect of our proposals.

2434. That is very important; that also did not seem to me to be appreciated in the evidence which has been given?—I agree, it is important.

2435. Why, while religious and charitable endowments are made Provincial, are Bills affecting such, or affecting religion or religious life, reserved for consideration of the Governor-General? What is your reason for that division between a subject and Bills regarding it?—The position about that is this: Under the existing Government of India Act any Provincial Bill affecting the religion or religious rites of any class of British subjects in India is made subject to previous sanction; that is, a Bill cannot be introduced in a Provincial Legislature of that class without previous sanction.

2436. The object is not to disturb that, is it?—If you would allow me, the effect of that provision has been to make legislation on that subject almost impossible. For fifty years a discussion has gone on as to legislation on the question of religious endowments, as to which some action is considered, by a large body of opinion, to be much required. It seemed desirable to us to give the Provincial Legislatures freedom of initiative on this subject. At the same time, we recognised that it was a delicate subject, and that in India particularly these questions required very careful handling. That security which I have just referred to with regard to previous sanction had stood on the Statute Book for a long number of years, and if it was removed, and nothing put in its place, there was reason to fear that alarm might be caused and harm might be done. Therefore, while recommending that the restriction should be removed, we proposed that Bills falling under that description, which were no longer subject to previous sanction, should be subject to what has been called compulsory reservation; that is, that the Governor of the Province should not assent to the Bill on his own authority, but reserve it for the consideration of the Governor-General; and we further proposed that certain matters, which would normally fall under (e)—that is, the personal law with regard to Hindoos and Mohammedans—should be treated as a central All-India subject, to be dealt with by the Indian Legislature.

2437. Irrigation continues to be a reserved subject in all the Provinces, I think?—Yes.

2438. Was the case of the rain-fed tanks specially put before you—the case for making such tanks a reserved subject which require no engineering skill, and which are merely catchment areas?—I think probably it was mentioned. You will see that we have added to the list of transferred subjects a note that there were certain matters falling within the limits of reserved subjects which might be dealt with by the local authorities, and we have said, "It is contemplated that other matters will from time to time be entrusted to local authorities by legislation; where such matters form part of reserved subjects the Bill will be reserved for the consideration of the Governor-General." We have allowed—that is, we have left the thing open in our proposals—that the subject of local self-government may be extended so as to include matters of purely local interest, which belong to reserved subjects, and to that extent we provide for the transfer of those matters through their becoming part of the work of local self-government.

2439. These local rain-fed tanks may come in that way under transferred subjects?—Yes.

2440. Under paragraph 67 of your Report there are a great many duties laid upon the Governor qua Governor, and these are to be laid upon him specifically by his letter of instructions. Is there any new letter of instructions that you have been taking part in the preparation of, because the only draft that I have seen would not cover these things, in my judgment. I ask you for yours?—I have been taking part in discussions on the matter, but I do not think I can conveniently give evidence as to the part I have taken in discussions at the India Office.

2441. They are not so far dealt with. Who would know why the Andaman and the Nicobar Islands were not adopted as all-India subjects?—The reason of that is that it is proposed that this list should be a list applying to Governors' Provinces, and therefore matters which are the concern of the Government of India, and which fall outside the limits of the Governors' Provinces, why that was omitted, and I think one other entry referring to territory other than Governors' Provinces no longer appears in the revised list.

2442. I now ask you a question which I do not ask you to enlarge at all, but I am greatly interested in it, as to the regulation of higher language examinations. The Government of India proposes to make that an all-Indian subject—I think for a very good reason. Can you say why it was not adopted?—The terms of Subject 30 in the list of central subjects have been extended in this revised list so as to cover the work done by the Government of India under that head, and it now reads as proposed: "Central Agencies and Institutions for Research (including Observatories), and for professional or technical training or promotion of special studies."

2443. That covers it?——

Mr. Spoor.

2444. I notice, Mr. Feetham, you transfer Excise in all the Provinces except Assam. Had you any information ever put before you which would indicate that the revenue from Excise is likely to become a diminishing quantity?—It was suggested that a policy might be adopted which would cause it to be a diminishing quantity. It was stated that the existing policy with regard to Excise was to raise the maximum revenue from the minimum consumption.

2445. It has been pretty generally suggested that India might go dry, and I was wondering whether you had any information brought before you which would bear that suggestion out?—What I derived from those upon

upon whose knowledge of India I relied was that the possibility of India going dry was a very remote one. As to what course liquor reform may take in India under the new scheme it is difficult to say.

2446. My point was as to whether there would be an appreciable reduction within, say, a limited time, because, if so, you said this morning that you thought there should be no reconsideration of this transferred list until we had a statutory Commission which would have the mark of finality on it, but if there is likely to be a change in the direction I have just suggested, it appears to me to be a reason why there should be an inquiry at an early date?—You mean owing to the financial resources for transferred subjects being diminished. They would only be diminished owing to a change of Excise policy or a development of Excise policy, which would not necessarily fall, under the scheme proposed in the joint Report, upon transferred subjects; it would fall on the joint purse.

2447. You do not think that is a reason for an earlier inquiry than you suggested this morning?—No.

2448. The only other point I should like to ask about is this. You agreed with the Secretary of State in what he said, that except in details your transferred list was the same in practically all Provinces. We had a question asked here two or three days ago as to whether it would not be possible even at the start to give complete autonomy in certain Provinces, and a suggested system of diarchy in others, remembering of course that some Provinces are very much in advance of others. Do you think that that is a practical suggestion?—I do not think it is, for the reasons I indicated in my reply to the Secretary of State. I think it is difficult to justify such a very great differentiation between Provinces in the form of Government as the adoption of that proposal would involve, and, as I say, our proposals leave room for what might be called automatic differentiation owing to the greater influence that the legislative councils in more advanced Provinces will naturally obtain over the reserved subjects.

2449. Do you think at the present time there is no Province sufficiently advanced to take over the management of all its subjects?—That was not a point which, as a Committee, my Committee had to consider, because in working out the problems put to us in our reference we had to assume the scheme, and proposals either for transfer of all subjects or transfer of no subjects were ruled out as being equally inconsistent with the basis of the scheme.

2450. You felt under a certain compulsion to reserve certain subjects according to your terms of reference?—There is no doubt under our terms of reference it was not our business to report upon proposals for what is called complete responsible government in any Province. That was the position as far as the Committee was concerned. Do you want my personal opinion?

2451. I was going to ask you, did you form a personal opinion as to whether that could be done in any case?—My personal opinion, which I have formed from a study of the subject, is that it would not be justifiable to take that step at this stage in any Province, apart from the difficulty of differentiating between Provinces.

Mr. Montagu.

2452. I wanted to ask one question, because I did not understand your answer to Mr. Spoor. You did not feel yourselves precluded from recommending that each function of a Province in turn should be transferred until there were no reserves left; there was nothing in your terms of reference that precluded that?—Yes, I should personally have regarded it as outside our terms of reference to recommend that there should be no reserved subjects, as well as to recommend that there should be no transferred subjects, because it seemed to me to be inconsistent with the basis of the scheme with which we were dealing. I point out that. I do not mean to say that had the terms of reference been wider the Committee would have recommended complete transfer in any Province.

2453. Supposing you had set yourself, in Bombay for instance, to consider each function of Government in turn, as to whether it should be reserved or transferred, and you suddenly came to find yourselves face to face with the fact that you were transferring all of them, would you have said, "Hullo! we must not consider the next one on its merits, because we shall be left with no reserved function at all"?—No, because I think we should have started with a general view of the position instead of being suddenly caught at the end by finding that we had only one subject left.

Mr. Montagu—continued.

2454. May I take you through one or two of the items in the paper circulated this morning? In the list of Central subjects No. 3 is "relations with Native States." Did you have evidence in Bombay of the desire of some of the very small Native States in Bombay to continue in direct connection with the Governor of Bombay rather than to have to be in direct relation with Simla or Delhi?—We did not hear any evidence in Bombay, as far as I recollect, from Native States directly. We were told that there were a very great number of Native States dealt with by the Government of the Bombay Presidency—over 300. We contemplated that under our arrangements it would be open to the Government of India to deal with their work in relation to Native States on an agency basis—that is, the use of Provincial Governments or the Presidency Governments as their agents in dealing with the Native States with which they were directly concerned.

2455. I asked the question because I have had representations during the last week from a ruling chief in Bombay who, on reading your Report, thought that point was not clear. You contemplated, by making it a Central subject, that, although it is an All-India subject, it could be dealt with by delegation?—Yes.

2456. About the Land Revenue. I gather your main argument against the transfer of Land Revenue is that the conditions of Land Revenue administration are not at all uniform throughout India, and that you think that statutory legislation will be necessary in the coming year, and that that legislation will have to be done either as All-India legislation or by the executive half of the Government which has been accustomed hitherto to the administration of Land Revenue?—I am not sure that I can deal with that question in one answer. You put it that my main argument against the transfer of land revenue was the fact that I thought it an unsuitable subject for direct Parliamentary control?

2457. In its present form?—I do not know that it would be correct to say that that was the main argument. Transferring the Land Revenue Administration would involve a very far-reaching change, not only because of the importance of the subject itself, but because of the way in which that particular work of administration is linked up with the whole system of the government of the country and the special character of this subject, which is more than one subject really—it is a whole group of things—was certainly a very strong reason against recommending transfer at the outset. There was also this consideration, which is referred to in one of the paragraphs of the Report, that the whole question of the interest which the Central Government should retain in the administration of Land Revenue still requires to be decided. That point we expressly abstained from attempting to deal with, as stated in paragraph 24 of this Report. That point must require further consideration when the question of transfer of land revenue comes up for further decision.

2458. On that last point am I to understand that the revenues which are available for All-India purposes are very largely dependent on revenues which are ultimately received in the way of land revenue, and the transfer of the administration of that revenue to popular control might diminish the revenue available for the Government of India. Is that a consideration?—Yes, it would affect a change with regard to land revenue, such as the introduction of a permanent settlement. I am not now suggesting that that is probable in any Province, but it is a possibility that such a change might be proposed. Such changes as that would affect the resources of the State in India, and must have a great effect on the prosperity of the people as a whole.

2459. I want to ask a question about the division of functions regarding industry. I see in the All-India subjects, 20A, you have, as an All-India subject, "Development of Industries in cases where such development by a Central Authority is declared by Order of the Governor General in Council expedient in the public interest." Then you have as a reserved Provincial subject, No. 24, "Development of Industries, including Industrial Research and Technical Education"?—As a transferred subject.

2460. Then the reserved one is Factories, Welfare of Labour, and that kind of thing. Would it not be very difficult in practice to make that triple division? Taking the position of an individual industry, say the factories in Bombay, I suppose it is conceivable that the Governor General in Council might say, "It is necessary for All-India purposes, the position of Bombay being what it is, that the development of the industries of Bombay, in the public interests of the whole of India, should remain a central subject." Then you have the Factory Conditions and the Welfare of Labour, Housing, and that kind of thing a reserved subject, and the Industrial Research and Technical Education in connection with Factories handed over to popular control. It seems to me that industry must be in one category?—May I take those points in succession? The first point is the point raised as to this new entry now reserved in the list of central subjects: "Development of industries in cases where such development by a central authority is declared by order of the Governor-General in Council expedient in the public interest." Apart from that entry, the list, as proposed by the Functions Committee, in effect, I think, confers on the Government of India power to promote the development of certain major industries. You will see the terms of No. 20, "Control of Production, Supply, and Distribution" of certain articles, and then you have to bear in mind that the Government of India is the military authority for the country, responsible for the defence of the country, and is the railway authority for the country, and in connection with both those subjects it must have freedom to provide for the production of its own requirements. We have added this now—this 20A has been added owing to the view pressed by the Government of India that their power to promote the development of a particular industry, the development of which might fall under a Provincial Government, should be made clear. That is the object of that entry. Then, as to the use of this term, "Development of Industries," the stress is on the development, as distinguished from administration of the existing industries. The subject so described is intended to cover direct Government activity towards creating or pushing on a particular industry, not the ordinary work of Government in relation to private enterprise. The ordinary work of Government in relation to private enterprise would fall under the Factory Administration, the Regulation of Mines, and other heads, and that we have left as a reserved subject. I do not say the division is a clean-cut one. I do not know that in the nature of things it was possible to make it so, but it seems to me possible to work out in the course of administrative practice a reasonable system on the basis of the division as proposed. We were confronted with this, that in the illustrative list it was proposed that the "Development of Arts, Crafts and Local Industries" should be a transferred subject. We could find no satisfactory means of distinguishing between local industries and industries which were not local. Then we had the Report of the Industrial Commission, which dealt with the whole subject, and included amongst its recommendations the attaching of technical education to the Department of Government dealing with the development of industries; and with a view to securing the freedom of Provincial initiative in the development of industries we thought the best plan was to transfer the development of industries generally, not attempting to distinguish between local and other industries, and allowing technical education to be linked with that.

2461. So that you really transferred technical education and industrial research and the development of industries as the result of the Report of the recent Industrial Commission?—In the light of that Report. That Report did not deal with this question.

2462. Following upon that Report?—We had that Report before us, and also a statement from Sir Thomas Holland. The Government of India also had the Report before them, and they expressed an opinion against the transferance. I do not want the Committee to imagine that we based our proposal on that Report, although it was made in the light of the Report.

2463. That is one of the points on which your opinion and the Government of India's opinion differ?—Yes.

2464. On this question of the welfare of Labour, including provident funds, industrial insurance (general health and accident), and housing, do you not think that might be transferred? Is it not very important that social questions of his kind should come under the responsibility of a Minister as soon as possible, so that the responsibility may lie with the Ministers who are responsible for social and economic questions of that kind?—Did you take one only of the heads of 25?

2465. I was thinking principally of one?—That was a point we considered. We felt it was impossible to split that up, because that would have involved two administrative authorities dealing with the same subject, or rather the administrative authority with regard to factories and mines, and so on, being divided between the official and the popular branches of the Government. Such a division we endeavoured to avoid.

2466. The next question is what is your principal objection to the transfer of the whole of (a) to (g)?—That is under Subject 25.

2467. Subject 25, on page 5?—We did not consider that this subject 25, "Industrial matters included under the following heads," and then follow, "Factories, settlement of labour disputes, electricity," and so on, which may be regarded as falling more or less under the description of administrative control of industry, was a suitable subject for transfer at the outset, first of all because it was apparent that such a transfer would have caused alarm to big industrial interests, which might interfere with the development of industry in the country. It was undesirable that this should be dealt with at the start for that reason, because of the alarm which any such step would have caused. Secondly it was not a subject which responded to the criteria laid down for our guidance in paragraph 238, speaking generally. You recollect what those criteria were, and this subject did not appear to answer to those criteria. Thirdly, as regards the relations of capital and labour, until some experience has been obtained of the working of the new electoral system and so on, it seemed inexpedient to bring those questions directly under the control of the new Councils, somewhat for the same reason, that it was inexpedient at the start to bring the questions relating to landlord and tenant directly under the control of those Councils.

Lord Islington.

2468. As regards Nos. 23 and 24, which are to become Provincial subjects, "Development of mineral resources," and "development of industries, including industrial research and technical education," you say that you came to those conclusions you did after reading and considering the Report of the Industrial Commission?—Yes, we had that Report supplied to us.

2469. If this is carried out, and these matters become Provincial matters, would you say that the recommendations in the Industrial Report would have to undergo very substantial modification to comply with those proposals that they should become Provincial subjects? I mean by that, are not many of the important proposals in the Industrial Report based upon central control and central management?—That subject, I think, is very fully dealt with in this Memorandum of 27th June, both with regard to making the development of industries a Provincial subject, and with regard to making it a transferred subject. We did not think our proposals were inconsistent with the terms of the Report of the Industrial Commission, as interpreted in the light of the Memorandum we received from Sir Thomas Holland, and which was quoted.

2470. You did not regard them as inconsistent?—No.

2471. By

2471. By that I take it you mean that you would be prepared to assent to certain important branches of control being retained in the hands of the Central Authorities?—I am not modifying our recommendations. I am explaining that we regarded them as consistent with the proposals of the Report of the Industrial Commission, as interpreted in the Memorandum we received from its President.

2472. I will read that Memorandum?—It is quoted in this Memorandum which I have referred to.

2473. I will read it again, because it is difficult for me to reconcile the suggestion, having read the Report of the Royal Commission, and seen what their proposals are, and seen these proposals here, that you should have the development of mineral resources and the development of industries as Provincial matters?—As regards the development of mineral resources, that is made a Provincial matter only to the extent that authority is given to the Provincial Government under regulation framed by the Secretary of State. It is only partially, therefore, a Provincial subject. As regards the other question, the terms of the Report were not perhaps perfectly clear in some places as to whether it was contemplated that the Indian Department of Industries would have the power of command and control, or only be a source of advice. As interpreted to us by Sir Thomas Holland, the idea was that they should rely on such control as they would obtain over Provincial activities through the excellence of the advice they would be able to give; and, of course, you will recollect that the Report proposes——

2474. It would be constituted, therefore, of a purely advisory character?—Yes.

2475. What you have just said means that it would be advisory?—That follows, of course, from making the development of industries a transferred subject.

2476. I gathered by your putting this in anywhere ——?—As you know, where a subject is transferred it is proposed that the rights of the Central Government to interfere administratively should be restricted to certain purposes to safeguard the interests of its own subjects, and so on, and beyond that it would not be able to do more than advise.

2477. As far as possible, I take it, you desire to see the development of these industries and resources undertaken by the energy and enterprise of the Provinces themselves?—That is the idea.

2478. I see on your list, under "Central Subjects," that railways and tramways are to be retained as central subjects. Why, tramways, other than those that are municipal, because I see that light railways, or feeder railways, and so on, are to become Provincial. What was in your mind when you proposed that tramways should go along with railways under central control?—It will be seen that we except from the tramways, which we put under central control, tramways within municipal areas, which are, I suppose, the most important class of tramways. We included tramways with the railways otherwise, owing to the extreme difficulty of making a clear distinction by definition between railways and tramways, but we left it open to the Provinces under our proposals to provide by their own legislation for the construction of tramways, and to the extent to which they did so provide either for the construction of tramways or for the construction of light or feeder railways, those light or feeder railways or tramways would become Provincial affairs.

2479. Officially, I suppose, you had no oportunity of considering, because it was no part of your reference, as to whether any subjects should be transferred within the Central Government?—It was no part of our reference.

2480. Would you be prepared to give us any opinion on the subject from the experience you derived when in India? As you will have heard, we have had a great deal of Indian evidence and Indian applications that certain subjects might be placed under Ministerial control of the Central Government?—It is a point quite outside the reference to the Committee of which I was Chairman.

2481. I realise that, but I merely ask if you would feel disposed to give an opinion?—I am not satisfied, so far as I have studied the question, that a case has been made out showing that it is expedient at this stage to have any such division of subjects in the Central Government.

2482. Now what impression did you derive as to the extent to which under the present system the Provincial Governments are unduly controlled, or unnecessarily controlled by the Central Government? Could you give us any of your mind upon that point? I am not talking to you on the transferred subjects; I am now asking you whether you consider in the case of a reserved subject more latitude or not might be allowed to the Provincial Executive in its relations to the Central?—We have advised that more latitude should be allowed under the new system, but it is difficult for me to criticise the present system. That, obviously, was not part of the work we had to do. Under the changed conditions which these reforms will bring about we made certain recommendations as to the principle upon which the control of the Central Government should be relaxed, owing to the fact that you get this new power coming into being, the Provincial Legislative Council containing a majority of elected members, and elected on a comparatively speaking wide Franchise.

2483. You are not prepared to give us any more information on that point, apart from your official investigation. I am asking you really from your personal experience?—The subject of our inquiry was in itself wide enough.

2484. Would you be prepared to give us any information as to the extent to which detailed supervision on the part of the central authority might be relaxed with regard to these reserved subjects beyond what has hitherto been the case?—We have stated in the Report that under the new system there should be on certain principles a relaxation of control with regard to reserved subjects. We have made that an important point in connection with this Provincial list. The effect, according to our proposal, of including a subject in the Provincial list is stated in paragraph 22 of the Report.

2486. Would you suggest that that modified control should be embodied in the Act?—No. What we propose in detail is stated in paragraph 26. We say there, "We have received from the Provincial Governments a number of detailed proposals for the relaxation of this control" (that is the control of the Central Government) "in particular matters, either by the delegation of powers or by the amendment of the Act concerned, and the Government of India have also supplied us with departmental memoranda treating the question on similar lines. We are not in a position to deal with these detailed suggestions, but we recommend that the matter should be carefully examined now in the light of the material collected and of the new relations to be established between the Central and Provincial Governments"; and we quote the Government of India's own pronouncement on the subject in favour of the overhauling of the position on the lines indicated.

2487. You recommend that the Government of India should overhaul the matter, and recommend to the Secretary of State the extent to which they should relax their powers of control in the future. Is that the extent of your recommendation?—Yes; we recommend that the existing Statutes should be revised.

2488. You cannot give any opinion on the subject which may occur to you whether the Secretary of State might become the best agent of Parliament for control over the Provincial Government rather than the Government of India?—We had not the last point in mind. Generally speaking it seems to me difficult to contemplate the cutting out of the Government of India, because it has still very large administrative responsibilities for great departments, such as railways, customs, the Army, and so on.

2489. I am not talking of the Central functions?—Would you allow me——

2490. I am talking of the purely Provincial functions?—But it has these big responsibilities which bring it into touch with the Provincial Administrations at every turn, and it also has responsibilities as the guardian of the well-being of the public services, and as the ultimate guardian of public order, and in connection with relations with the Native States, which, again, bring it into touch with the management of Provincial affairs. It is difficult to be able to see how you can get questions as between the local governments and the superior authority adequately dealt with if you cut out the Government of India, which exercises control over all these matters directly, and which is therefore affected by the Provincial proposals.

2491. Did you ever hear, when out there, complaints that Provincial Governments were either checked or delayed in their activities owing to the control of the Central Government?—Nobody could be in India without hearing complaints of that kind. I imagine you would get them anywhere where you had a central authority in relation to local authorities. The local authorities always think the central authorities are slow, and exercise too detailed a supervision.

2492. In those complaints, which apparently were numerous with you——?—It was not our business to hear complaints.

2493. Did any of them strike you as substantial complaints?—It was not our business either to hear or to assess those complaints; our business was to find out the best conditions for the operation of the new scheme.

2494. Your business was to assess the future relationship and control between the Central and the Provincial Governments?—Under the new conditions.

2495. Particularly control in the case of reserved subjects, and whatever control there ought to obtain in regard to transferred subjects?—I thought you were inviting me to criticise the present work of the Government of India under the existing conditions, and that was not a matter which it was our business to investigate.

2496. I will not put it in that way. The reserved subjects, as we see, in the future will not be so very dissimilar from what they have been in the past, and they will be the subject of Parliamentary control: that is so, is it not?—You mean control by the British Parliament?

2497. Yes, Parliamentary control?—Subject to Parliamentary control? In that connection there is a new factor.

2498. It is to have the superior authority. But what I asked you was whether in your experience you thought that agency of control, which hitherto has been the Government of India, has been the cause of delay and undue check on the activities of Provincial Governments?—I am not prepared to go beyond paragraphs 24 and 26 and the other passages dealing with that matter, because it was no part of the business of the Committee to pass judgment upon the Government of India, and I certainly should not have been able to undertake it.

2499. I will not press you; it is a very vital and important question, and I was very anxious for information upon it——

Lord Sinha.

2500. I want to get the position of those lists you put in to-day clear in the record. There are lists of Central subjects and Provincial subjects on the one hand, and as regards Provincial subjects, lists of transferred subjects and reserved subjects in your report. That is the Functions Committee's Report; is not that so?—Yes.

2501. Then after that come the criticisms of the Government of India in their despatch?—Yes.

2503. Yes. As the result of that consideration, alterations had been made in the original lists appended to your Functions Committee's Report?—Yes.

2504. Those alterations appear in the lists which you handed in to-day, which are headed, "Lists of Central and Provincial subjects proposed by Functions Committee, showing amendments approved by India Office Reforms Committee, 31st July, 1919"?—Yes.

2505. This list showing the amendments puts the amendments in italics?—It puts the added words in italics, and the omitted words in brackets.

2506. That is what I want to get clear on the record; the excluded words are in brackets, and the subsequent list which you put in to-day is a clean copy?—Yes, we have taken the lists as contained in the Report of the Functions Committee as the basis for the purpose of those prints, and we have one print showing the amendments with the words it is proposed to omit in heavy brackets, and putting in italics the words proposed to be added. Then there are also clean copies of the lists as revised with those amendments.

2507. That is what was not clear to my mind, and I wanted to have it clear on the record. Now I ask if you would look at the first list—that is with the amendments either in italics or with the words struck out. Will you tell the Committee, please, as to what are the important amendments which are made in consequence of the criticism of the Government of India—that is, the despatch on the Functions Committee's Report?—The important amendments?

2508. Yes?—I have to take first the lists of Central and Provincial subjects?

2509. Please?—It is rather difficult for me to select the amendments. I do not know whether you wish me to run briefly through them and say what they are.

2510. Perhaps it would be sufficient for my purpose if you told us what are the two principal ones, as I consider them, or the principal amendments in your view?—I have already explained why Item 4 is proposed now to be omitted, because the list would only deal with the transfer to Governor's Provinces. No. 5, "Excluded Areas," was included in the All-India list in view of the passage of the Joint Report with regard to the treatment of backward areas, which appeared to us to involve that that subject should be dealt with as a Central Government subject. After discussion it was considered it could more conveniently be dealt with as a reserved Provincial subject, and it has been transferred therefore from the All-India list to the Provincial list, where it now appears as No. 33A.

2511. From Nos. 6 to 20 are really all drafting amendments?—I think they may be so described. Then there is 20A, with regard to the development of industries, which I have already quoted and attempted to explain. No. 20B is not really new; it is simply a portion of 20.

2512. That is really drafting again?—The new version of 30 is merely drafting; it has slightly extended the effect of the entry.

2513. Nos. 38A, 38B, and 38C?—Those are additions proposed by the Government of India for specific mention; otherwise they would have fallen under the general heading No. 40, "All other matters not included in the list of Provincial subjects." It was thought that these three items were of sufficient importance to require special mention.

2514. Then we come to the Provincial subjects?—Yes.

2515. The change in No. 1 is in the description of local self-government?—That is drafting. The alteration in No. 3 makes Public Health, Sanitation and Vital Statistics "subject to Indian legislation in respect to infectious and contagious diseases to such extent as may be declared by any Act of the Indian Legislature." That is also a drafting amendment; that is framed to give effect to a proposal made by the Functions Committee, to which formal effect had not been given in the lists as actually appended to the Report. The same explanation applies to the words added to No 9, Agriculture, and 10, Civil Veterinary Department.

2516. And 13, probably?—No. 5, perhaps, I should refer to; 5 provides that certain monuments and burial places should be left in the charge of the Government of India.

2517. No. 16 is more or less drafting, is it not?—No. 16, I think, might be described as a drafting amendment, and also the alteration in 6 with regard to water supplies and irrigation.

Mr. Montagu.

2518. There is nothing of any importance really.

Lord Sinha.

2519. No. 4 is practically drafting?—Yes.

2520. May I take it with regard to the criticisms of the Government of India that, so far as it was a question of drafting, the modifications suggested by them have been adopted?—Yes.

2521. The two points of importance with regard to which there was any difference between the Functions Committee and the Government of India were, firstly, as regards the question of Education and the question of Industrial Development?—Yes.

2522. Those are the two main points?—Yes, they were certainly the two main points on the question of transfer.

2523. On the question of the Provincial subjects there is not anything very essential?—No. I do not want to minimise these things; there are important points with regard to the exact relations between the different Legislatures and so on.

2524. That does not affect the list?—It does affect the list to some extent; it affects those entries which are subject to Indian legislation, but in that case these lists adhere to the proposals of the Functions Committee.

2525. These lists are according to the Report of the Functions Committee?—On that point, yes.

2526. Then with regard to the reserved and transferred, the two subjects I mentioned are the only two important points on which there was any difference of opinion?—Yes.

2528. With regard to Industries, as I understand, a good deal of the recommendations of the Government of India have been accepted?—There is no alteration as regards transfer. The subject of the development of industries, so far as it is a Provincial subject, still stands as a transferred subject. The alteration is that the authority to be left to the Government of India to declare special industries to be such that their development required the action of the Central Government is made clear.

2529. That practically, as you have told us, is to be applied to the bigger industries which the Provinces are not likely to be able to take up?—That is what is contemplated.

2530. Therefore, with regard to the industries which the Provinces are likely to be able to take up, having regard to their financial condition, they are transferred?—They remain transferred.

2531. So that substantially it is an agreement between the Government of India and the Functions Committee Report; there is substantial agreement with regard to that also. The Government of India does not, as I understand it, desire to undertake the control of industries which the Provinces can develop and ought to develop?—No, the views of the Government of India are expressed in their despatch. I think that is probably a fair statement of the views, but the Government of India, of course, wished the Provincial subject of the development of industries to be a reserved subject. That is the main difference between their proposals and ours.

2532. Having regard to the fact that the most important industries are likely to be undertaken, if undertaken by anybody, by the Government of India, is there any object in reserving the smaller industries in the Provinces?—I think the question of reservation or transfer is an important question in the case of the development of industries as a Provincial subject.

2533. I quite agree, and all I want to know from you is this: Is there any reason why the smaller industries, or industries already in the charge of the Provinces, should not be transferred to a responsible Minister, advised by technical experts as he would be, of course?—No doubt arguments could be found against it, but my own conclusion is in favour of the transfer.

2534. That is, of course, the conclusion of the Committee?—That is the conclusion of the Committee, to which I adhere.

Mr. Bennett.

2535. May I ask, Mr. Feetham, if your Committee were unanimous in holding that land revenue was not a suitable subject to transfer?—That is a point with which I have dealt. The position with regard to the Committee appears from paragraph 46 of the Report. There was not actually a note of dissent on the subject, but certain members would rather that the decision had been otherwise.

Mr. Montagu.

2536. In Bombay?—In Bombay only.

Mr. Bennett.

2537. Did you find amongst the witnesses you examined a strong desire to see land revenues transferred?—A number of witnesses asked for the transfer of the revenue in some Provinces, but, of course, the transfer of every subject was asked for in turn. The extent to which the transfer of land revenues was pressed varied in different Provinces.

2538. You have held that by the nature of the land settlement, where the settlement is for a term of years, it is inherently unsuitable for parliamentary treatment; you have expressed yourself somewhat to that effect, have you not?—Dealt with as the question of resettlement is dealt with to-day, the subject is unsuited for direct parliamentary control.

2539. The Committee recommended that light or feeder railways should be a transferred subject?—Within certain limits, yes.

2540. And the Government of India have not quite agreed with that; they dealt with it as a reserved subject, I take it?—There is a difference of opinion about that. It is rather a confused point, because the Government of India proposed to classify light or feeder railways as a Provincial subject in far more general terms than those we proposed to employ. They proposed to make light or feeder railways generally a Provincial subject instead of restricting the subject as a Provincial subject, as we proposed, to the light or feeder railways which were constructed under Provincial legislation.

2541. Did you find a prevailing interest in this matter of light-railway extension in India?—Well, in certain Provinces, especially in Madras.

2542. Did you find it in Bengal—I mean railways constructed by municipal resources?—We did not hear very much about it in Bengal.

2543. Did you find there were traces of a distrust of the Government of India in its attitude towards feeder railways and light railways?—We found that in Madras district boards had been imposing rates in certain cases for years for the construction of light or feeder railways, the construction of which had not even yet begun, and it seemed extraordinary that that position should go on, that people should be willing to pay these taxes for non-existent railways. The money, of course, was accumulating with the view to having a fund out of which these could be constructed, but in the meantime the question as to whether they would be constructed or not was hung up.

2544. The Government append to these papers, apparently with approval, a note by the Railway Board, objecting to your proposals. I take it you do not agree with the contentions in that note. For instance, they allege as a reason why these matters should not be dealt with by the Local Legislature the existence of contracts between the Secretary of State for India and the companies which were working the railways. Do you regard that as an insuperable objection to legislation by the Provincial Councils for railway extension?—No, clearly not. We proposed that special conditions should be laid down as to the notice to be given of any proposed legislation in the Provincial Councils on the subject of light or feeder railways, so that all interests concerned might have an opportunity of putting their case, and the subject is dealt with in this Memorandum, where we discuss the views of the Railway Board.

2545. Your scheme would somewhat derogate from the power and authority of the Railway Board, would it not? You do not leave so much in their hands as is in their hands at present?—They would not have such complete control over provincial initiative as they have to-day.

2546. Did you find anything like what might be called extravagant appreciation of the working of the Railway Board in India?—You see, it was not our business to assess criticisms, and I do not think I can enter into that.

2547. There is no reason why the Provincial Governments should not arrange terms, is there, for the construction of feeder railways?—No doubt those projects have to be considered in the light of the question of railway development as a whole, because a railway may be a feeder railway one year, and next, owing to some development, it may become a main line, and, therefore, you must consult the central railway authority.

2548. They speak of the utter unsuitability of the English system of Private Bill legislation for India; they say that nothing of the kind has ever been introduced into India, and they speak of the difficulty of applying that system in India, but would it not be simpler than it is in England; for instance, there would be no, or little, question with regard to land rights. Did you take that fact into view?—The question of land acquisition, of course, was considered separately—the present machinery for that, which requires some expansion and development.

2549. But that would scarcely arise in the inquiries into these schemes?—It depends how far they revise the existing provisions as to land acquisition.

2550. In most instances the Government provide the land for the railways, and very often these light railways run up roads, do they not, so that these difficulties to which the Railway Board refer would scarcely exist?—We refer to the desirability of some procedure similar to that applied to Private Bills under British Parliamentary practice. That, I think, was mainly with a view to an inquiry, where witnesses could be heard, and so on.

2551. By a Select Committee?—Yes.

2552. Then I take it generally you adhere to your proposals with regard to the light railways under the conditions which you have laid down; you adhere to them?—We adhere to our proposals; that is stated in this Memorandum we have put in dealing with the Government of India's objections.

Mr. Montagu.

2553. I wanted to ask Mr. Stephenson a question or two: Have you anything to add to Mr. Feetham's statements?—(Mr. Stephenson.) No; I entirely agree with the answers.

2554. You were in the room this morning when Sir Frank Sly gave his evidence?—Yes.

2555. Is there any point of his which you would like to deal with?—I do not think so. I think I should put the estimation in which the Civil Service is held—as to which you, sir, asked a question—rather higher than Sir Frank Sly did.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE EARL OF SELBORNE IN THE CHAIR

THE HONOURABLE N. M. SAMARTH, THE HONOURABLE C. Y. CHINTAMANI, MR. K. C. ROY, and MR. PRITHWIS CHANDRA RAY are called in; and Examined, as follows:—

Chairman.

2556. Mr. Samarth, you are from the Presidency of Bombay?—(Mr. Samarth) Yes.

2557. You were a member of the Legislative Council?—Yes, on behalf of the University—elected representative of the University in the Bombay Legislative Council.

2558. At one time you were Secretary of the National Congress?—I was Secretary of the Provincial Congress Committee for several years, and of the Bombay Presidency Association.

2559. Did you take any part in the work of the Southborough Committees?—I was a co-opted member for Bombay on the Functions Committee, presided over by Mr. Feetham.

2560. Mr. Chintamani, what is your Presidency?—(Mr. Chintamani.) The United Provinces of Agra and Oudh.

2561. Were you on the Legislative Council?—I am.

2562. I think you are connected with an important newspaper?—Yes; I am editor of the "Leader," an English daily paper.

2563. Mr. K. C. Roy, which is your Province?—(Mr. Roy.) I come from Simla and Delhi.

2564. Are you connected with the Press?—Yes; I am a journalist by profession, and I am the head of the Associated Press.

2565. Mr. P. C. Ray, which is your Province?—(Mr. Ray.) I come from Bengal. I am joint editor of the "Bengali," of Calcutta.

2566. And you four gentlemen are members of the Liberal Party?—(Mr. Samarth.) Yes.

2567. Will you act as spokesman, Mr. Samarth?—I wish to supplement some of the observations made by

Chairman—continued.

Mr. Banerjea, and Mr. Chintamani may be permitted to supplement me.

2568. Will you supplement each other, and not cover the same ground?—Yes. I and the party for whom I stand accept the announcement of the 20th August, 1917, in its entirety. We do so because it is, as I said on another occasion, a happy paraphrase of Article 1 of the Congress Constitution. The Congress Constitution lays down, as its first Article of faith, that the objects of the Indian National Congress are the attainment by the people of India of a system of government similar to that prevailing in the self-governing dominions of the British Empire, and that Article further goes on to say that these objects are to be attained by a steady reform of the existing system of administration. The system prevailing in the Dominions is responsible government. It is to be obtained and attained by a steady reform of the existing system of administration. That means the progressive realisation of responsible government. Therefore the announcemnt, as I have already said, was welcomed by us as a very happy paraphrase of Article 1 of the Congress Constitution. Now, the latter part of the announcement lays down that the time and measure of each advance is to be regulated by His Majesty's Government and the Government of India, and the guiding principle of that is the co-operation to be obtained from the elected representatives of the people, and the confidence which the Government may be enabled to repose in their capacity and judgment. I am not quoting the exact words. I think that is the latter part of the announcement. The exact words are these: "The British Government and the Government of

of India, on whom the responsibility lies for the welfare and advancement of the Indian peoples, must be judges of the time and measure of each advance, and they must be guided by the co-operation received from those upon whom new opportunities of service will thus be conferred and by the extent to which it is found that confidence can be reposed in their sense of responsibility." We hold that legally and constitutionally no other position is tenable. Having said so much about the announcement with all its limitations and implications which we accept, we ask what are going to be the promised substantial steps in fulfilment of that announcement, because the announcement itself promises that substantial steps will be taken in realisation of that goal. We accepted the Montagu-Chelmsford scheme of Reform as on the whole a substantial measure of reform so far as provincial reconstruction and progress went, and we would be satisfied if that scheme is embodied in the Parliamentary Statute; but if anything short of that scheme is going to be given to us, depriving the scheme of what we consider to be its vital features, the large body of sober opinion in the country which has accepted the scheme will not be ready to accord support to any such Bill or any such Statute.

Your Lordship will permit me to emphasise two or three points upon which my party is keen. By my party, I mean the bulk of the thinking portion of the people of India. The first question is: What are the evils of the present excessively centralised system of government in India? I think Lord Islington asked that question of Mr. Feetham the other day. Mr. Feetham felt himself unable to answer that question, because he thought it was not proper for him to do so.

2569. It was outside his experience?—Yes. I propose as briefly as possible to place before your Lordship's Committee the evils under which Provincial Governments suffer at present in order that the measure which your Lordship's Committee is going ultimately to evolve may not contain any of the defects and evils and drawbacks from which the present Provincial Governments have been suffering. I cannot put that case better than by quoting one or two passages from a statement presented by the Bombay Government before the Royal Commission on Decentralisation, the Bombay Government being at that time presided over by Lord Sydenham, who was Governor of Bombay. In that document—which was a very able document, presenting the whole case for the Provinces in a manner in which it was not presented by any other Government—the Bombay Government, after pointing out how the excessive control exercised by the Government of India has increased the labour, worry, and annoyance involved in making proposals for reform or improvement which may or may not be accepted by the Government of India, and may be summarily rejected on the authority of some official at Simla who is not expected to have the necessary knowledge and information at first hand of local requirements and circumstances, observed as follows in one or two passages to which I respectfully invite your Lordship's attention. The Bombay Government observe: "Administrators and officers subjected to a long course of this treatment must be reduced to the condition of oxen in an oil-mill, which tread their little circle unconsciously with blinded eyes. All sense of responsibility must disappear, since those who have no definite power can feel no responsibility." I apply that also to the Legislative Councils. "Already it is difficult to see where the responsibility for any particular action or decision lies. The effect on the people of the country is pernicious. They go to the Local Officers about a certain business and find that it rests with the Local Government. If they get as far as the Local Government they find that it is the affair of the Government of India. The Government of India is far off, and no one can tell who in any particular matter is for the moment the Government of India."

Then in another passage of great significance they observe as follows: "The existing system of centralised administration is unknown in any other portion of the world of comparable area and diversity. Already this system is tending to break down under its own weight, while it inevitably prevents or delays progress and destroys initiative and responsibility. Even if we had to deal with a purely passive population the drawbacks of the exaggerated centralisation which has been allowed to grow up without deliberate intention are manifest. The forces"—and I beg to draw your Lordships' Committee's attention to this passage particularly—"the forces which are now producing what is called unrest in India will unquestionably broaden and deepen with the years. While there is yet time it is necessary to lay the foundation of a system of administration which will readily adapt itself to the new conditions without shock or dislocation involving grave danger to the stability of British rule in India." I cannot put my case more forcibly than that, so far as the evils of the present system are concerned. I am anxious to impress upon your Lordships' Committee this, that whatever the measure which your Lordships' Committee may now evolve, let us not have this centralised system perpetuated in any form; otherwise in the name of Provincial autonomy you will be perpetuating at the same time a bureaucratic rule over the Provinces, which will cause the same worry, annoyance and trouble to the Provincial Governments in important respects, and hamper the progress of an advanced Province like Bombay, with whose conditions I am acquainted.

I plead more especially in this connection in favour of a Province like Bombay; I cannot speak with equal knowledge or authority in regard to other Provinces, but I place in this respect, Bengal, Madras and the United Provinces more or less on the same level, though not in all respects. I have a grievance in regard to that, and I say that the special claims of Bombay have scarcely been done justice to by the two Committees presided over by Lord Southborough—the Functions Committee and the Franchise Committee. I will give your Lordships' Committee only such information as is available for public use, and will be careful not to place before this Committee any information which may have come to me in my capacity as a co-opted member of the Functions Committee. If your Lordships turn to the Government of India's letter of the 5th March, Command 123, page 198, you will find in the Minute of Dissent written by an Indian member of the Bombay Executive Council, Sir Ibrahim Rahimtoola, what the view of the Bombay Government was in respect of the reserved and transferred departments. I am reading from paragraph 5, at page 198: "In considering the question of transferred and reserved subjects this Government"—that is to say, the Bombay Government—"has come to the conclusion that if the scheme is to be given effect to in the form it is published, then the following should be reserved: Peace and Order, Law and Justice, Political, Major Ports"—that is Bombay, Karachi and Aden—"Services (Imperial), and that all other subjects should be transferred." In the marginal note it is mentioned that the Honourable Mr. Carmichael dissents as to Land Revenue, which he would reserve. When this Minute of Dissent was written, the majority of the Council was in favour of the transfer of Land Revenue. Only one member of the Executive Council dissented.

2570. Out of how many?—There are four in all, including the Governor. Lord Willingdon was then Governor, and only one member of the Legislative Council, Mr. Carmichael, differed. Another member of the Council, the Honourable Mr. Curtis, who had spent 30 years of his life in the Revenue Administration of the Presidency, apparently agreed to the transfer of Land Revenue in the Bombay presidency. I am not going to say what he said. He apparently agreed to treat Land Revenue as a transferred subject in Bombay. Then I say as this was the view of the Bombay Government, why should the Functions Committee whittle down the proposals of the Bombay Government and give us less than what our own Government was willing to give us? I cannot account for it, except on the ground that there is a nervous fear of differentiating between one Province and another, with the result that a standard is set, as in the case of an incompetent teacher, if I may say so, who sets his standard by the dullest boy, with the result that the talented boy in the class suffers.

2571. You do not expect us to have the invidious task of picking out the dullest boy do you?—No. My complaint is that the Bombay Presidency has suffered, and consequently whatever measure is ultimately passed should leave sufficient elasticity to each Government to promulgate a measure of reform in such a way as to suit its own conditions, and not to hamper the progress of an advanced Province, like Bombay, by laying down a certain standard which will be an invariable common standard for all the Provinces in India.

I will now very briefly touch some of the other important vital issues which are considered to be necessary in any scheme which will give satisfaction to the bulk of sober opinion in the country. In that respect I lay great stress on the Budget provisions for the Province. I heard here the evidence of Sir James Meston, who contested the correctness of the interpretation which has been placed upon the Budget provisions of the scheme in a document to which I am a signatory also signed by Sir Dinshaw Wacha and published in Command 123 of the Government of India's Letter, at page 128. He referred to a passage in paragraph 11 printed at page 133, and said that was a gloss practically which was not justified. I maintain that that passage contains the correct interpretation of the provisions of the Montagu-Chelmsford Reform Scheme, so far as the Budget proposals are concerned.

2572. Are you talking of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report now?—Yes; of the Report proposals upon which we commented in the memorandum which we published on the 26th July, 1918.

2573. What I want to get is, you are commenting on the scheme as it originally appeared?—Yes; the correctness of which was questioned by Sir James Meston. That passage is paragraph 11 of Command 123, Letter of 5th March, at page 133. "But we attach the greatest importance to the provision that the Ministers alone will be responsible for additional provincial taxation, and that no such taxation will be imposed except with their approval." There seems to be here some confusion as to the original proposal of the Reform Scheme on the part of those who criticise our commentary. The Reform Scheme only stated that no additional taxation shall be levied except with the approval of the Ministers. That does not mean that anybody else in the Government will not bring forward a taxation proposal, but the taxation proposal cannot be brought forward unless it has got the assent of the Ministers. The point was this. The Provincial Government will have to bring forward taxation proposels in order to make provision for the expanding growth of the departments which will be transferred, and many of the transferred departments belong to this category. The scheme was that there should be joint deliberation between the Ministers and the Governor and the Executive Council. Estimates will be made as to the revenue. The revenues will be allocated by mutual deliberation and consultation; the reserved departments will be provided for and the Ministers will then get the residue, and if they want more for their purpose they will have to go to the House for additional taxation. The object of it was this: We objected in the interviews which we had with the Secretary of State and the Viceroy to any piecemeal treatment of the finances of a Province, and we put forward this concrete instance. We said: If the finances of a Province are to be treated in a piecemeal fashion like this—namely, one portion to be entirely in the hands of an uncontrolled part of the Government and another in the hands of a controlled part of the Government—there is bound to be immediately a deadlock, because the Minister, or the member of the Executive Council, whoever he may be, when he comes before the House with such a proposal, would be met by the answer: We are not going to pass that taxation because we have absolutely no voice in what you call reserved departments—in departments over which we have no control, and in respect of which extravagant expenditure we think is going on. Unless we have a voice in controlling that expenditure we are not going to listen to your demand for taxation, with the result that there would be immediately a deadlock. The way to avoid it is this: You must give to the members of the Legislative Council, through their

Chairman—continued.

Ministers as well as through Standing Committees elected by them, a voice in the reserved departments and a vote to the Legislative Council also in regard to reserved allotments. If their vote is so perverse, or absurd, that the department, in the opinion of the Governor, cannot go on, then you give the Governor the power to restore a particular estimate. But if the Governor thinks, after all, there is not much of a difference between the vote passed by the Legislature and the estimate proposed to the Legislature—supposing the latter estimate was a million and the vote of the Legislature was to reduce it to 900,000, and the Governor thinks: "Well, after all, I can accept the vote of the Legislature," there should be nothing to prevent the Governor from doing so. Unless the vote of the Legislature is perverse or absurd the Legislature should have the power to vote upon all allotments, reserved as well as transferred. If this is provided for then alone there is likelihood of co-operation, mutual goodwill and smooth, harmonious working of the machine; otherwise there will be at the very start a temper and a sulkiness resulting in untoward consequences. It is with a view to meet that that the scheme provided the proposals contained in the Report, and we immediately accepted that as an excellent via media for the purpose of starting the country on the career of responsible government. I have explained without reading the passage that what the considered scheme really gave was this: If the scheme is given effect to, there will be nearly five-sevenths of the financial control in the transitional period over the whole of the finance except in regard to what may be called certificated items or allotments of government. If this is not granted, if this is whittled down, then the main provision of the scheme which elicited cordial support from the vast bulk of the thinking part of the population will have been taken away, and we shall regret any such step being taken by your Lordships' Committee.

One word as to what has been considered to be the introduction of Parliamentary procedure in regard to Budget provisions. I submit with great respect that there is no analogy between the procedure which is followed by Parliament and the procedure which must be given effect to in a transitional stage where you have diarchy. In the first place, whatever the procedure of Parliament, it is based on this basic idea that the whole of the Executive Government can be removed from office and another party can come into office. Secondly, in the Parliamentary procedure there are certain taxes which are renewed every year—it is annual taxation—in order to give an opportunity, as I understand, to the House to either vote its confidence in the Government in power or not. There is no such provision in the proposals which are now to be found in the Bill, and I therefore do not accord, and my party does not accord, support to the provisions as formulated in Clause 9 of the Bill. We want the original proposals of the Montagu-Chelmsford scheme to be given effect to and embodied in the clause—the proposals, as we have explained in paragraph 11 and the previous paragraph 10 of this Memorandum. We want also the original proposals of the Under-Secretaries and Standing Committees to be incorporated in the Bill, and not to be relegated to rules. I should not have minded their being embodied in the rules but for the fact of the opposition which those proposals have elicited from the Government of India, and I do not like the Government of India to be given power to either, at its own sweet pleasure, institute these Standing Committees or not in any Province that it likes by giving power to the Province to do it.

I attach the greatest importance to the educative influence of Standing Committees and Under-Secretaries. The whole idea is that there should be harmonious working, between the Legislature and the Executive. How are you going to bring about this result if you keep away the Legislature practically from the working of the machine, and then bring forward, spring upon it, proposals at the last moment once in the year in respect of which the bulk of the Legislature has had no previous opportunity of going into and investigating? The Standing Committees, both on reserved and transferred subjects, will, from month to month, and day to day, have opportunities, papers being placed before them which will acquaint them with with the difficulties of the administration and communicate those difficulties to their brethren in the Council and bring a sort of steadying influence to bear upon the whole Legislature. I attach importance to the Standing Committees on this ground. Another is that the Standing Committees will also have an opportunity —that is, a number of men, elected men of the Legislature, will have an opportunity which is now denied to them of studying these questions, and thus acquainting themselves with the inner working of the administration.. I attach great importance to this training also; consequently I regret that the proposal for Standing Committees has not been given effect to in the Bill. I regret that the Government of India have opposed it. I strongly emphasise the necessity of introducing this in the Statute itself, so as to prevent the Government of India, or any Government afterwards, whittling down that proposal.

I come then to the five years' inquiry. Already in the memorandum which we have submitted there is a long paragraph which I need not repeat, in which we lay emphasis upon the five years' inquiry. My main point is this: We have heard Sir James Meston saying that the progress made in India during the past five years has been so marked and rapid that a man who has not been there for five years will have hardly any conception of the rapid growth of self-consciousness and of patriotism and public spirit that has taken place. In years to come I may assure your Lordships' Committee that this process will go on with a momentum which it is impossible to assess. In any case the progress in the five years under the new scheme will be so rapid that it will be a grievance with an advanced Province if its progress is hampered on account of the arbitrary ten years' limit which will be laid down for the Statutory Commission to come. It should be permissible to a Province like mine, that is Bombay, to make headway even during the interval of ten years. After five years, if the Government and the Legislature agree, why should there be any difficulty in making any progress we like, commercial, industrial, and in agricultural matters, in respect of all matters which may not have been even transferred at present? The majority of the Government of the Province to which I belong were in favour of transferring land revenue at one time. After two periods of the new Legislative Councils, or, it may be, even after three years, the Government may unanimously think we had better transfer land revenue; why should you prevent the Bombay Government from doing it? Why should you lay down a hard and fast limit that for ten years there should be no progress? That is my complaint.

Another point is this. Diarchy is, after all, an experiment. We have tried to visualise as many of its difficulties as possible, and provide for them in the scheme—I mean Mr. Montagu and Lord Chelmsford have done so. There may be certain departments which may overlap. The Governor is given power under the scheme to regulate these matters. It may be that experience, even of three years, may show that it is much better to transfer the whole of the department instead of being made up into two, and if that is the opinion which the Government arrives at, nothing could be done under the Bill for ten years, and no power will be given to the Government to do it. I submit that the five years' inquiry, upon which we laid great stress, should not be abandoned. Either progress will be made or no progress will be made. If progress is made further progress should be facilitated. If no progress is made no harm is done by having that five years' investigation. That is the position which I respectfully submit for your Lordships' Committee's consideration.

I go next to the question of the Governors. Our position throughout has been that if you are going to start these Parliamentary Institutions, as you have wisely decided to do, then let us have men trained in the public life of England to guide our destinies in all the Provinces as far as possible. The Bill should take the form that ordinarily the Governors of Provinces shall be men from the public life of England. I do not exclude talented civilians. Sir Richard Temple was one Governor. There may be sometimes talented Governors from the Civil Service. I do not wish to exclude them, but that should not be the rule, that should be rather the exception.

In respect to the United Provinces, my friend, Mr. Chintamani, will have his say. I will only say this, that I desire the United Provinces to be raised to the level of the Presidency Governments, namely, Bombay, Madras and Bengal.

I come next to the Executive Councillors. We laid stress upon the fact that the Montagu-Chelmsford scheme provides that there would be two members of the Executive Council, one an official, and one an Indian. Combined with that we took the other proposals that there will be one Minister, or it may be in advanced Provinces two Ministers, chosen by the Governor from the elected members of the Legislative Council. The composite government, the Executive Government therefore will consist of a Government in which the Indian element will have a predominant voice. That was the proposal which the Bombay Government at one time made. The Bombay Government, even in the proposals for Unitary Government, which they put forward when Lord Willingdon was Governor of Bombay, was willing to have a majority of Indian members on the Executive Council. That is my personal knowledge of what the Bombay Government wanted to do, but whether they wanted to do so or not, I say supposing my Government is willing to work the machine with a predominant Indian voice, why should it be prevented from doing so. We attach the greatest importance to that in order that there may be harmonious working between the Legislature and the Executive. We therefore would insist upon the original scheme being given effect to, namely, that in all Provinces there should be only two Executive Councillors, one an Indian and one British, otherwise the transfer to Ministers of subjects will be considerably delayed and hampered by the number of Councillors if the number of Councillors are four. No four Councillors have been yet appointed, though the Statutory Provision says four; only three have been appointed, one of whom is an Indian. The work will go on very well if there are only two members of the Executive Council, one official and one Indian, and the rest of the work is given to the Ministers. Now I come to the position of the Ministers upon which I have one word to say.

2574. You understand we do not want you to repeat what is in the memorandum already?—No, I only emphasise one point. The Montagu-Chelmsford scheme started with this, that Ministers will not be in the first instance responsible to the House; that they will be not removable by the Legislature, but responsible to the constituency, and at the end of six years the Government of India may either place their salaries on the estimates or the Legislature may, by resolution, ask the Government of India to do so. Consequently, the proposals took this form, that Ministers shall during that interregnum be guided by the advice and control of the Governor, because they are not removable by the House. Now, the change you propose—and we welcome the change—is that Ministers shall from the start be responsible to the House. Very good. If they are going to be responsible to the House they cannot serve two masters. They can only serve the Legislature, and consequently their position in respect to the Governor can only be the position which they would occupy to the constitutional head of an administration. You cannot have it both ways. You cannot make the Ministers responsible to the House and at the same time controlled and overridden by the Governor so as to let the Governor do anything he may like to do in regard to Ministers and their transferred Departments. No self-respecting Minister will be found ready to undertake such a task. Consequently, the original proposals which are retained in the Bill—namely, making the Minister controllable by the Governor, and giving the Governor power to do over the head of the Minister what the Minister may not even have advised—is a position which is incompatible with the Minister's responsibility to the House.

I next pass on to the provision for Grand Committees. I have hitherto heard the evidence as to Grand Committees, but no stress has been laid upon the

the necessity for the provision contained in the Memorandum to which I have referred, published in Command 123, at page 128. We attach importance to Grand Committees for two reasons—not only that they are necessary for the purpose of enabling the Governor to have legislation passed——

Sir Henry Craik.

2575. Where is this?—It starts at page 128, and the passage I am referring to is at page 134, paragraph 14, the last few lines of that paragraph. We say: "This machinery is devised not only as a check on the Legislative Council in respect of Legislation affecting peace or tranquillity or 'reserved' subjects, but also as a constitutional safeguard against the arbitrary exercise of discretion or authority by the Governor in Council in respect of Legislation on such subjects." The choice is between two things—either give a veto to the Governor, so that whatever he says will be final, which will produce irritation, or provide the machinery which will act as a safeguard against the arbitrary exercise of discretion or authority by the Governor. After all, we are all human; we have to provide for a machinery against a tactless or unstatesmanlike Governor. I do not think it is an impossible contingency, and in any scheme you have to provide a safeguard against that. I look upon, and my party looks upon, Grand Committees as a safeguard against such arbitrary exercise of discretionary authority by Governors. A Governor may certify wrongly that the Bill trenches upon the peace and tranquillity or reserved subjects. If he has a veto, that is an end of the matter. The wrong exercise of the discretion will only produce irritation in the Legislature. Therefore, he must be compelled to go to a Grand Committee. The Grand Committee therefore must be such that it must be constituted, as proposed in the original scheme, of a bare majority in favour of the Government elected ad hoc from the Legislature and nominated by the Government. So that if the Governor is right, then, with the aid of nominated members, he would be able to have his opinion emphasised. If he is wrong, then the Grand Committee, consisting also of nominated members, will fail to support him. If the Grand Committee thus constituted fails to support him the Governor may take it that the exercise of his discretion was wrong and must not persist in the Legislation which he had attempted to certify. We therefore look upon that Grand Committee as a necessary safeguard, and if that is to be a necessary safeguard against the Governor the original proposals must be given effect to.

I pass on now just for a moment to the consideration of the Central Government. I will not repeat the arguments which have hitherto been addressed to your Lordships' Committee, for the purpose of the further liberalisation of the Central Government; I will only ask your Lordships' Committee to visualise what is likely to happen. In the Provinces you are going to set up a fairly good machinery, which will throw open to men of talent and capacity opportunities of service and distinction in their own Province. In the Central Government you are only having an elected majority and a Deliberative Assembly with recommendatory functions; that is to say, the present Morley-Minto model with the advance made that there is going to be an elected majority in the Legislative Assembly of India. Do you expect men of talent and capacity to go away from their Provinces and waste their time and energy and money at Delhi and Simla in taking part in an Assembly, which, after all, will be more or less a glorified debating society? Men with more money than brains will no doubt go, but you do not expect, you should not expect, others. So far as I know my countrymen, none of my countrymen of capacity and wisdom and ability will care to go to Delhi and Simla, throwing away the opportunities open to them in the Provinces. What is going to happen? You are going to set up in the Central Government a Legislature in which there is an elected majority, and that elected majority will be men of mediocre ability. They will have no effective voice, no determining vote; they will merely have power to recommend. The Government of India will remain bureaucratic all the same. To my mind the prospect is that within three years there will be an agitation of such a character set up in the Provinces for the purpose of liberalising the Government of India and making it responsible to the House that it may stagger imagination. I am, therefore, anxious in the interests of securing co-operation, mutual goodwill, and harmonious working throughout, from top to bottom, to provide some machinery by which men of talent and capacity will in large numbers, at any rate, be attracted to the Central Government. How are you going to do that unless opportunities are thrown open to men of talent and capacity to run the machine effectively—for certain purposes, at any rate, if not for all purposes? Therefore it is that we say that at least some beginning should be made in the Central Government towards responsible government. So that if even one man is taken from the elected members of the Legislative Council, who will be the Minister chosen by the Governor-General, then at any rate there is a possibility of a stream of talented men going in the expectation of being able to be at the helm of the machine and inside the arcana of the Executive Council or Ministry, as the case may be, so that they may be able to mould the destinies of their countrymen to some extent at least. That is the one thing which has dominated the wishes of the party to which I belong, and on July 26th, 1918, when we published our Memorandum in the Press, we gave expression to this view. I have not hitherto seen, either from the Government of India or from anybody, any answer to this contention. They are not going to tell us how they are going to attract men of talent and capacity to the Central Government under this scheme. I will not dilate more upon this aspect, because the other reasons have already been placed before your Lordships' Committee.

One aspect of the matter to which I invite the attention of your Lordships' Committee is also to be found in the Memorandum to which I referred. I refer to page 135, paragraph 17, in which we say that an advisory financial Committee should be set up in the Government of India of non-officials, and that Committee should be taken into confidence by the finance member before he finally prepares his budget for submission to the Legislature. It should be open to the Government to withhold information, to disclose which may be deemed inconsistent with the public interest, but "subject to this necessary restriction, the non-official voice must be heard in the preparation of the Budget"—in the Government of India Budget, of course. If the Budget is going to be put to the vote of the Legislative Assembly of India, no doubt that will be a welcome advance. If that is not going to be done, then, at any rate, we ask, in paragraph 17, at pages 135 and 136, for an advisory financial Committee to be set up in the Government of India which will be consulted and taken into confidence by the finance member before the Budget is framed and placed before the Legislative Assembly of India.

I will pass on now to the India Office and the Secretary of State and his Council. I gave evidence before Lord Crewe's Committee, and it is a personal gratification to me that most of the suggestions that I respectfully submitted have found favour with that Committee. Here I am anxious to emphasise three broad principles which I ventured to place before that Committee, and I am desirous that those principles should find statutory recognition in the Bill now under the consideration of your Lordships' Committee. In the Memorandum which I submitted I laid down these three canons: First, in the matters in which the Legislative Assembly of India and the Government of India concur there should be no intererence by Parliament, and therefore none by the Secretary of State. Secondly, in all matters in which the Provincial Government and the Provincial Legislature concur there should be no interference by the Government of India, and therefore none by the Secretary of State. Thirdly, in matters in which there is a difference of opinion between the Legislature and the Executive (that is to say, of either the Government of India or the Province), or where a Governor overrules his Minister—this was made at a time when I had not the proposals of the Bill before me—namely, making making the Minister responsible to the House at the start—"the Secretary of State shall review the matter and shall have the power to intertere in such manner as he may deem fit after taking the advice of his Council, which it should be made obligatory on him to take in all such matters, assuming that the personnel of the Council is democratised as suggested above." These are the three principles which are necessary to be given effect to for making the machine work smoothly. I think they are so evident that I need not dilate upon them. If any questions are asked I shall endeavour to answer them.

One more matter upon which I wish to address your Lordships' Committee relates to the Indian States I happen to be connected with several of them—members of my family having held high positions—and I am also in my professional capacity connected with five first-class Indian States. There is a clause in the Bill which permits rulers of native states or subjects of native states to be nominated to the Council. That is Clause 6, Sub-Clause 4 of the Bill, which reads: "Subject to any such rules any person who is a ruler or subject in any State in India may be nominated as a member of a Governor's Legislative Council." I am in a position to say this, that at least it will be well for your Lordships' Committee, before going in for that Clause, to ascertain the wishes of the Indian Princes. So far as I know there will be unwillingness on their part to have that provision retained in the Bill. The Government of India have criticised the proposals. Long before that I wrote an article in a magazine called the "Bombay Political Reformer" on the question of the status of the Rulers of Indian States and their constitutional position. I took the same view then as that which the Government of India have now urged, and further went into the question, What will be the effect upon Indian Princes if they are members of Legislative Councils? Whether they are nominated or whether they are elected makes no difference whatever. As soon as an Indian Prince is a member of a Legislature, the vote of which is not going to affect his State or his subjects, the elected members of the Legislative Council are bound to ask: "Why should he have any part or lot in legislation or in a Legislature, the operation of which does not extend to his State. And if he is going to have a voice in our Legislation, then we should have reciprocally a voice in questioning his administration and the way in which his State is being conducted. It is therefore right and proper that this matter should not be complicated by the insertion of a clause like this, and personally I would strongly suggest that that clause be deleted. That is all I wish to submit.

Chairman.

2576. Then I will ask Mr. Chintamani what he has to say in supplement. I am afraid I must strictly keep you to a supplementary statement?—(Mr. Chintamani.) I desire in the first place to submit to the Committee a very few matters relating in particular to the Provinces from which I come, the United Provinces of Agra and Oudh. I desire to mention that I speak on behalf of the United Provinces Liberal Association, which has deputed me and my friend, Mr. Kunzru. The first point relates to the status of the Governors. In the Second Schedule 2 to the Bill, the Committee will find that while the salary of the Governors of Bengal, Bombay, and Madras is fixed at 120,000 rupees per annum, the salary of the Governors of the United Provinces, the Punjab, and Behar and Orissa is fixed at 100,000. These figures represent the present salaries of the Governors of Bengal, Bombay, and Madras on the one side, and the Lieutenant-Governor of the Provinces on the other. An explanation of this differentiation can be found in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, and still more pointedly in the Government of India's despatch of the 5th March, where it is stated that, as a rule, the present practice of selecting the heads of provinces other than the three presidencies from among members of the Indian Civil Service shall be continued. My submission is that the present practice should not be continued, at all events in the case of the

Chairman—continued.

United Provinces. I do not ask that there should be any statutory limitation. There is nothing now to prevent a member of the Service being appointed a Presidency Governor, and I do not suggest that there should be anything in the future to prevent such appointment. But I protest against what the Government of India speak of as the understanding, that ordinarily the Governors of these Provinces shall be selected as the Lieutenant-Governors have been selected until now. And we shall be assured that this will not be the case if in the Schedule of salaries the figure with regard to the Governor of the United Provinces is raised from 100,000 to 120,000. In fact we want our Province to be the United Presidency of Agra and Oudh and to be treated in all respects as a Presidency. As long ago as 1833 it was provided that the Province of Agra shall be under a Governor. The provision was repeated in the Act of 1853. But in between a measure was passed enabling the Government of India to continue to keep the Province under a Lieutenant-Governor, and all these 83 years that Act has remained a dead letter. In the plea that I make I am happy to say that the people of the Province are in entire agreement with the Government of the Province. The Government, the Legislative Council, the Zemindars and the middle-class, non-official Europeans, Hindoos and Mohammedans are all of one mind in this matter, and in the Despatch of the United Provinces Government appended to the Government of India's Despatch of the 5th March there is this sentence, "These Provinces have a larger population than the Presidencies; they constitute the heart and core of India; they contain all that is most venerable to the greater masses of Hindoos and Mohammedans; they are the scene of some of the greatest events in Indian history; and under the proposals of the Report they will occupy the second place in the matter of Provincial contributions to Imperial Revenues." I am content to rest my case on that.

2577. Are you speaking only in respect of the United Provinces, or do you recommend that the Governors of all Provinces should receive the same salary?—I do recommend that the Governors of all Provinces shall, as a rule, ordinarily be selected from among the public men of the United Kingdom. With regard to salaries, I confine myself particularly to the United Provinces. I cannot speak with equal knowledge of the other Provinces.

The second point with regard to the United Provinces relates to the financial contributions to be made by the Provincial Government to the Government of India. A perusal of the paragraphs relating to this in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report will show that the Presidency of Madras and the United Provinces suffer most by reason of the principle adopted that it shall be a percentage of the gross Provincial surplus that shall be taken as the basis of calculation. I realise the difficulty which the authors of the Report dealt with, that they cannot start Provinces under the new regime with a deficit, and if they are to avoid that difficulty they have not found it feasible to adopt any basis of calculation other than the one they actually did. They admit that it perpetuates inequalities of treatment, and I believe they would also admit that the arrangement is particularly hard on two of the poorest Provinces in the country, Madras and the United Provinces, whereas the richer Presidencies of Bengal and Bombay will practically continue to be the beneficiaries of those Provinces. I do not suggest to the Committee that any alteration should be made which would result in starting Bengal or Bombay or any other Province with a deficit, but I make this suggestion, that you might provide that the excess contributions levied from Madras and the United Provinces shall be treated as a loan given by them to other Presidencies through the Government of India, and that when the other Presidencies have so far improved their financial position as to be able to make both ends meet and lay by a surplus, the first charge on that surplus shall be a refund to Madras and the United Provinces of the excess contributions levied from them in the intervening period.

My third point relates to the composition of the United Provinces Legislative Council. I may say in general terms that I accept the recommendations made by

by the Franchise Committee in that regard, but I would submit that it is a great hardship on the landholders of the Province of Agra that the taulukdars of Oudh through their Association, the British Indian Association, should be given five seats on the Council as against the one which they now have, while the landholders of the Province of Agra would have either no seat or only one seat. In this respect I entirely agree with the observations made by the Government of India in their Despatch on the report of the Franchise Committee, and I would recommend that there should be three seats for Oudh and three for Agra—three seats for the talukdars of Oudh and three seats for the landholders of Agra, as the Government of India recommend, in place of the recommendation made by the Franchise Committee. The arguments put forward in the Government of India's Despatch I entirely adopt.

One word about university representation. I personally am not very keen that Universities should continue to enjoy the representation, but I accept the recommendation made in the Memorandum of our Deputation. I would make one suggestion. The University electorate should not be restricted to Fellows of the Universities, but should be enlarged by the inclusion of the registered graduates. Each University keeps a register of graduates. I understand that in this country the University electorate which returns a member to Parliament does not consist exclusively of persons who correspond to the Fellows of our University, but the graduates are also included. The Government of the United Provinces told Lord Southborough's Committee that they had absolutely no objection to the enlargement of the University electorate by the inclusion of the registered graduates.

I differ from the Southborough Committee in the matter of Woman Franchise. I warmly advocate Woman Franchise.

I hope that the recommendations of the Functions Committee that the entire subject of education and of the development of industries shall be included in transferred subjects, will utlimately prevail as against the proposal made by the Government of India in their Despatch on the Report of that Committee. The Lieutenant-Governor of our Province was the first Education Member of the Government of India, and he has told the Functions Committee, and also stated in his Despatch to the Government of India, that he does not want the subject of education to be divided between reserved and transferred, but that the whole of it may be transferred.

I have only a few minutes to take with regard to some general points. My friend Mr. Samarth has informed your Lordships' Committee that we represent a party of supporters of the Montagu-Chelmsford scheme. While according a general and discriminating support to that scheme, we have also indicated in various ways, for the last time in the Memorandum which is now before this Committee, a number of improvements which we regard certainly as desirable—some of them as essential—in that scheme in order to make it more conveniently workable, and in order that it may produce a livelier satisfaction among the thinking men of India. Anything less than the proposals embodied in the Joint Report it will be impossible for us to support or to enthuse over. The Government of India's Despatch of 5th March proposes modifications the cumulative effect of which is undoubtedly, despite the intention of the Government of India, to whittle down the scheme. I do not say that every modification proposed by the Government of India is bad, that every one of the modifications is reactionary, that every one is of equal importance; but, speaking of the majority of the suggestions made by them and of the cumulative effect of those suggestions, I am sorry to say that I have unhesitatingly to maintain that the effect is to whittle down the scheme.

Coming to the Bill, there are a lot of omissions left for rules. I recognise that not all those things can be brought in as provisions of the Statute, and must necessarily be left to rules; but at the same time I feel that some of them can be inserted as sections of the Act itself; for example, what subjects shall be transferred, what subjects shall be Provincial, and what subjects shall be All-India, and, in more precise terms, the control of the Legislature in matters of finance, and so on.

Taking the Bill with its omissions, and with the clauses as they stand, with the light thrown upon the omissions as well as the clauses by the Secretary of State's explanatory Memorandum, and reading the whole thing in the light of the Government of India's Despatch of the 5th March, an uneasy feeling is left in the mind that, in spite of all the endeavours that have been made by politically-minded India to get something more than is in the Joint Report, one section advocating much more, another section advocating only something more, no advance is indicated in any matter whatsoever, and the Bill shows that even the propositions of the Report are not left intact, and it is felt that if the Bill does not undergo some improvement and expansion we shall eventually have to be content with something less than what is in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report. I repeat what my friend Mr. Samarth has said, and what I believe we have also stated in our Memorandum, that, taking into account the totality of circumstances, we cannot be supporters of anything less than the Report scheme.

I have to add one argument to what has already been said with regard to the point of the Inquiry by the Governor-General in Council at the end of five years. I would invite the attention of the Committee to the proviso to Sub-clause 2 of Clause 1, which is on page 2 of the Bill: "Provided that, without prejudice to any general power of revoking or altering rules under the principal Act, the rules shall not authorise the revocation or suspension of the transfer of any subject except with the sanction of the Secretary of State in Council." Apart from the form in which this is put, the meaning of it is clear. Unless I very gravely misread it, this proviso confers power upon the Executive Government of India, with the sanction of the Secretary of State in Council, to revoke or suspend a transferred subject at any time. The Legislative Council of the Province concerned need have no voice in the matter. Now, if you turn to the passage in the Joint Report, you will find the provision made is this. It is in paragraph 260 of the Joint Report: "After five years' time from the first meeting of the reformed Councils we suggest that the Government of India should hear applications from either the Provincial Government or the Provincial Council for the modification of the reserved and transferred lists of the Province; and that after considering the evidence laid before them they should recommend for the approval of the Secretary of State the transfer of such further subjects to the transferred list as they think desirable. On the other hand, if it should be made plain to them that certain functions have been seriously maladministered, it will be open to them, with the sanction of the Secretary of State, to re-transfer subjects from the transferred to the reserved list, or to place restrictions for the future on the Minister's powers in respect of certain transferred subjects." The difference between the two positions is this: In accordance with the Montagu-Chelmsford Report scheme, for the first six years, i.e., for the lifetime of two Councils, after the new regime is started, the Governor in Council, as well as the Ministers and Legislative Council, are on sure and certain ground. In the sixth year of the new regime it shall be open on the one hand to the Legislative Council to apply to the Governor-General in Council to enlarge the list of transferred subjects, and, on the other hand, to the Governor in Council to move to curtail the list of transferred subjects and retransfer some of them to the reserved sphere. The result will depend entirely upon the inquiry which the Governor-General in Council will make, and the relative merits of the cases which the Governor in Council and the Ministers and the Legislative Council will place before the Governor-General in Council, the result of the inquiry. But in accordance with the provisions of the Bill it shall be open to the Executive with the sanction of the Secretary of State any day to revoke a transferred subject, and that without opportunity to the Legislative Council to make any submission. It is significant that this proviso does not include any power to the Executive Government, and the Secretary of State similarly, to increase the list of transferred subjects. I submit this is a very serious setback, and that there should not be this power given to the Executive Government and the Secretary of State to revoke a transferred subject except after six years. I plead for the restoration of the proposal made in the Joint Report and its embodiment in terms of the Act in place of this proviso.

I have only to endorse the observations which have already been made with regard to the financial control of the Legislature. I would ask you respectfully to reread sub-clauses (a), (b), (c) and (d) of Clause 9 relating to financial control of the Legislature, and to visualise what is the amount of reservation given to the Governor, and what is the residue of control left to the Legislative Council. If I am told that after all these exceptional powers given to the Governor are not meant to be used in the ordinary process of administration, but they are really reserve powers to be used sparingly, I will invite you respectfully to be so good as to make an assumption that it is not only the Legislative Council and the Ministers who are liable to go wrong, but that even the Governor may do wrong. I ask you to proceed upon the assumption that you have to provide against mistakes which may be made by the Governor, on the one side, and by the Legislature and the Ministers on the other, and not merely for an infallible Governor and constantly erring Ministers and Legislature.

2578. You must always remember that behind the infallible Governor is a hypothetical infallible Secretary of State?—Yes, my Lord. My only complaint is that it is merely hypothetical.

2579. And Parliament, which of course is infallible?—Our complaint throughout has been that the responsibility of the Indian Government to Parliament through the Secretary of State is much less real than nominal, and while neither in law nor in fact is the Government of India responsible to the people of India, but is responsible in law to the British Parliament, yet, in fact, to quote the words of an ex-President of the Congress, Mr. Yule, the 650 odd Members of Parliament have thrown back on Providence the trust that Providence committed to them for the good government of India.

2580. You may take it from me, having been a Governor of a Dominion, that the control of the Secretary of State is a very real one?—Of course, I take that from your Lordship, and I do not pretend that I know that the control is not real; on the contrary, it may be very real. I am speaking of the control of Parliament, whose agent the Secretary of State is.

One word about the position of the Services. I desire particularly to bring to the notice of the Committee a paragraph in our memorandum on this subject on the position of the Services. I wish it distinctly to be understood that we do not want any act of injustice done to the present members of any service in India; we do not want any dislocation of the administrative machinery; we do not want that the Minister should start with an entirely new personnel in the administration of his departments. We cordially approve of any decision that you may come to in order to guarantee beyond all possibility of doubt the privileges and rights of the present members of our Services. But we do say that it is going a trifle too far if you seek to provide for the position of future entrants into the Services, and take away the legitimate control which the Ministers and the Legislatures should have over the services in the transferred departments. The Government of the United Provinces and the Government of Bihar and Orissa have both recommended to the Functions Committee that the conditions of service in the transferred sphere should itself be a transferred subject. That recommendation has not found acceptance. Reading the paragraph in the Government of India's despatch of the 5th March, and the Secretary of State's explanatory memorandum, there is an uneasy suspicion in our minds that executive regulations may be made which will take away from the control which it is essential that the Minister and the Legislative Councils should have over the services, apart altogether from the other question of guaranteeing to the present members of the Services all the rights which they have at present. In this matter we accept the recommendation made in paragraph 29 of Professor Keith's minute of dissent appended to Lord Crewe's Committee's Report.

The proposed Select Committee of the House of Commons is an arrangement which we most heartily approve, and to which we attach great importance. In point of fact, the Indian National Congress recommended it as long ago as 1894. The arguments which are put forward in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report in favour of a Select Committee of the House of Commons are, to our minds, convincing, as against the arguments put forward by the Government of India Despatch for a Joint Select Committee of both Houses of Parliament, and as against the argument in the Crewe Committee's Report against a Select Committee at all. I would invite the attention of your Lordship's Committee to that part of our Memorandum.

With regard to the Governor-General in Council, I do not personally approve of the proposal to do away with the statutory limitation of the maximum strength of the Executive Council. I do not think a strong case has been made out to do away with the maximum which there is now in the Statute.

Next, if the maximum remains at eight, including the Governor-General and the Commander-in-Chief as an extraordinary member, and if there should not be the initiation of a system of responsible government in the Central Government, as we whole-heartedly wish and desire and recommend that there should be, then I would most earnestly plead that the Indian element in the Council should be fixed at three members, and not two. The ordinary members of the Governor-General's Executive Council are six; one-half of that would be three. Any person who may think that there is some lack of safety in increasing the Indian element in the Government of India may feel reassured by the reflection that the ordinary members of the Executive Council are not the whole Government of India—that there are two more, the Viceroy and the Commander-in-Chief, and that three will be only three out of eight, and not one-half, and even without the use of the casting vote of the Viceroy the European element will still be in the majority.

Without in the least impinging upon the third formula of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, a formula the soundness of which is not accepted by our party, but without in the least impinging upon it, accepting it for the sake of argument as sound and inevitable, even then I would say that the proposal that there should be at least three Indian members, and not two, in the Executive Council can be accepted without any jeopardy. Even if the Commander-in-Chief will not be in the Executive Council hereafter as extraordinary member, there will be three out of seven; but I presume that if the Commander-in-Chief will not be a member, the Indian Army Commission which is going out to the country is certain to recommend the restoration of a military member, so my argument is not affected.

With regard to the Council of State, while I prefer that there should be the Grand Committee procedure instead of a Council of State to give the Governor-General in Council the power to carry affirmative legislation, if the Council of State is to be retained I attach great value to the proposal of joint sessions of the two Houses in order to compose differences which is made in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report; and, further, I would urge that in no circumstances should it be open to the Governor-General in Council to carry a Bill through the Council of State and declare it law without ever placing it before the Legislative Assembly. You may retain power to the Governor-General to declare it law, even if it is carried only by the Council of State, but full opportunity of discussion should be given to the Legislative Assembly, and the device of the Joint Committee should also be resorted to before the extreme step of declaring it law without any concurrence on the part of the Legislative Assembly is taken.

2581. Now, Mr. Roy, what have you to say?—(Mr. Roy.) Mr. Samarth has already told your Lordships' Committee of our acceptance of the famous pronouncement of August 20th. I should like to remind your Committee that since then India's international position has been greatly improved. Thanks to the British Government

11 August 1919.] The Hon. N. M. SAMARTH, The Hon. C. Y. CHINTAMANI, Mr. ROY and Mr. RAY. [Continued.

Government, India is one of the signatories to the Peace Conference. She has thus secured for herself an international status, and it is your Lordship's Committee's high privilege to give India her rightful place as one of the self-governing units of the British Empire. This can only be secured by the adoption of the Bill which is now before your Lordships' Committee. The principle of the Bill is diarchic. I look upon diarchy as the necessary step in advance from the Minto-Morley reforms. The Minto-Morley reforms gave us all the evils of the unitary system, and a further expansion on unitary lines will only result in a deadlock, and will lead to the eventual paralysing of the executive machinery of our Government. I therefore hold that the only scheme which can fulfil the August pronouncement is diarchic. It has been suggested that diarchy is a novel experiment; but I do not think so. In fact, the British Government in India has been founded on diarchy. Lord Clive got the revenue administration of the country, and he left the criminal and civil administrations in the hands of the Hawak Nizam of Bengal. A great improvement in our constitution can only be made on the diarchic principle.

I should like to mention that in the past, since the Act of 1861, with which the name of Sir Charles Wood is associated, all our constitution makers have only added to our Legislative Councils without thinking what would be the function of the Council if one day the elected members and unofficial members were to outnumber the nominated members.

I now come to the home control of Indian affairs. I was a witness before the Crewe Committee, and I gave my evidence. I generally accept the conclusions of the Committee. I should like to see Section 21 of the Government of India Act so amended as to take away the vetoing power of the Secretary of State's Council. I should like to see the Secretary of State always acting in concert with his Council, or in conference with his Council, and I should like to see the power of veto vested in the Secretary of State, and not in the Council.

As regards the other points raised in the Crewe Committee's Report, I am very keen that the Secretary of State or Parliament should never intervene in matters in which there is unanimity between the Government of India and our Legislative Council. This is very important to safeguard our coasting trade, which is threatened, and to regulate our inter-Colonial emigration, as well as to give our industries a proper start, the proposals for which are now before the Government of India.

I should like also in the matter of certain subjects as grouped as popular by Sir James Brunyate, that the Secretary of State should, by custom, and not by any legislation or regulation, give up his control over them, and should more or less leave it to the Government of India and the Legislative Assembly. The other day Lord Islington asked Mr. Feetham about the agency power which should be exercised on behalf of Parliament, whether by the Provincial Governments or the Government of India. I believe in matters of transferred subjects the agency of Parliament should be exercised by the Provincial Governments. Although in transferred subjects the Secretary of State is supposed to have no power, in future he will have power; he will be asked questions in the House of Commons about public health, questions which are practically now international questions; he will be asked about the excise policy, and for this purpose I think the Secretary of State should communicate direct with the Provincial Governments, and not with the Government of India.

There is another matter which has been recommended by the Crewe Committee, which I should like to see embodied in the Bill, and that is the appointment of a High Commissioner for India in London. I want to see provision made in the Bill sanctioning the appointment of a High Commissioner who will carry on the agency work of the Government of India which is now performed by the India Office.

Now I come to Central Government. My leader, Mr. Samarth, made some observations about that which perhaps are his own opinions, and not the considered opinions of the Moderate Party. This was a point on which I had to give some evidence before the Feetham Committee, and I still hold to the views expressed there, that the control of the Government of India has always been for good, but if I am given the option of choosing the bureaucracy of the Government of India or the bureaucracy of a Provincial Government, I should certainly choose the bureaucracy of the Central Government. This is a considered opinion of many who have had the privilege of coming in contact with the Government of India, either in the Legislative Council or as their officers.

I welcome the idea which we have put forward, that we should have a certain amount of responsibility in the Government of India. I have not been able to put forward any constructive proposition, nor can I find that any constructive propositions have been put forward by any of the witnesses who have preceded me.

Mrs. Besant has suggested that three heads of administration should be placed for popular control; one is customs, another is tariffs, and the third is cotton excise. In my own opinion none of these subjects can be suitably transferred, because they have intimate relations with our foreign trade, which is in the hands of aliens. At the moment, when we are anxious to start this reform scheme with good will and the tacit consent of all, it would not be the right policy at all to antagonise our critics or give them an opportunity for suspicion.

As regards the suggestions made in our Memorandum, the first is the railways and post office. Of railways and the post office I saw a good deal as a member of the Central Transport Board during the war. I had exceptional opportunities of studying the transportation question. These two are indissolubly bound up with our military defence. The Post Office I found was more or less controlled by international convention rather than by the executive action of the Government of India. I do not think—this is my personal opinion—that these two subjects are suitable for transfer either.

Now I come to three other things which Mr. Sastri has suggested—salt, income tax, and "General Stamps." These are propositions for consideration, and I am prepared to see that your Lordships' Committee will consider whether they are suitable for transfer. I do not propose to express an opinion after what Sir James Brunyate has said in his Memorandum.

If the control of the university and higher education is to be retained in the hands of the Central Government, I think university education should be a transferred subject. In discusing this matter we are greatly handicapped by absence of official opinion. No expert opinion has been expressed on this Neither the Government of India nor any of the Provincial Governments, nor even Sir James Meston has expressed any opinion. I find one sentence in Sir Sankaran Nair's Minute of Dissent. He writes at the end of paragraph 33 on page 74: "Responsible government in the Provinces demands responsible government in the Government of India in the same subjects, as otherwise provincial responsibility will be diluted." I cannot conceive one diarchy in the Central Government controlling another diarchy in the Provinces. In my opinion, one diarchy in the Central Government controlling a diarchy in the Provinces is the negation of diarchy. I am therefore clearly of opinion that the subjects which should be chosen for transfer in the government of India, if they are chosen at all, should be absolutely independent of the subjects which are chosen in the Provinces. They should be Imperial and not Provincial subjects.

In addition to the diarchies, there are one or two propositions which I want to put before your Lordships' Committee. We want some degree of Budget control in the Government of India. We want to limit the powers of the Council of State, and we think that at least 50 per cent. of the members of the Executive Council should be Indians. I am very glad that in the draft bill, the Secretary of State has not given any clause for appointments of Indians on racial grounds, but only an indication that an appointment shall be regulated by the needs of the State. That is a proposition which I entirely endorse. Now the whole question of the Government of India is to be examined by a competent Committee which the Viceroy is going to appoint. Until the findings of that Committee are known, and there is a complete redistribution of portfolios consequent upon the changes to be brought about by the Feetham Committee's Report, it is impossible for us to put any definite limit on the personnel of the Viceroy's Executive Council. We are clearly of opinion that 50 per cent. of the seats should be assigned to us.

With regard to the Legislative Assembly, we are in entire agreement with the Southborough Report. Since the Morley-Minto reform came into existence Madras has been invariably represented by at least one non-Brahmin. In the first year a Mohammedan gentleman came through the general electorate, and a non-Brahmin came through the landowners' electorate; in the second year a Mohammedan came through the general electorate and a non-Brahmin came through the landholders' electorate, and in a third election only the non-Brahmin has been displaced by the Brahmin.

As regards the Council of State, I am clearly of opinion that so long as the Council of State has no oligarchal or aristocratic basis, and is likely to develop as a second Chamber, it will meet with a substantial amount of support from educated public opinion.

With regard to the Privy Council, we do not see why it should be established in India at all. They have been given no functions whatever. If your Lordships' Committee is prepared to transfer a Judicial Committee of the Privy Council from here to Delhi it is possible there will be some justification for the creation of a Privy Council in India.

Now I come to the question of the President of the popular Houses. We are absolutely bound to press that the President of these popular Houses should be elected. But two other alternatives are also suggested to me for the transitional period: one is that the Governor or the Viceroy may ask his Council to recommend somebody for the appointment, or that should the Viceroy or the Governor appoint anybody to be the President he should immediately resign his office, if he is an official, and absolutely leave the Executive Government. As regards the inquiry at the end of the fifth year, it is very essential, because the Government of India——

2582. We have had that already?—If an enquiry is made your Lordship will understand that it will pave the way and do the spare work for the Parliamentary Committee, which will meet at the end of the tenth year.

With regard to the Provinces, as to the appointment of the Governors, I entirely endorse what has been said in our Memorandum; but in recent years the men you have given us do not belong to what are known in India as front-rank politicians. If we can get front-rank politicians for our high offices in India nothing can be better; if we do not get them I should not like men belonging to the permanent services in India who have made their name to be debarred. I do not see any reason why they should be debarred from these high offices at all.

2583. I understand your point to be this: That you prefer front-rank politicians as your Governors?—Yes, men who know something about public life.

2584. But, rather than have second-rank men, you would say that the leading men in the Indian Civil Service should have their opportunity?—I should not like to see India the dumping ground for those for whom you have no need in this country.

Now I come to the Provincial Executive Councils. The Bill has an enabling clause on the subject of Executive Councils. Mr. Montagu has provided that there shall be four members—two Indians and two Europeans. I think that enabling clause may stand as it is, but I would like to say that one Indian and one European should suffice for all future purposes. But if as the result of devolution or decentralisation too much work is thrown upon a Provincial Government, the Governor or the Governor-General in Council may, with the consent of the Secretary of State, appoint two other members—one an Indian and the other a European.

Now I come to the Budget control in the Provinces. I am in favour of the joint purse, but I should like to see the joint purse placed under a Joint Treasury Board consisting of one Executive member and another—the Minister. That will smooth away a lot of difficulties in the preliminary stage of Treasury control and Budget procedure and Budget preparation.

I want to say one word as to the Statutory Commission. They should also be given the power of inquiring into the administration of the Government of India with a view of ascertaining what powers could be suitably transferred to popular control.

2585. Now, Mr. Ray, will you give us your evidence?—(Mr. Prithwis Chandra Ray.) Yes. Speaking for myself, I think that if the Bill had accepted the proposal of a bi-cameral legislation for the Central Government and the Provinces—a system of government which not only obtains in England, but in almost all the self-governing Dominions and in several parts of Europe—the Government could very well have avoided the scheme of diarchy with all its sequel of complicated and doubtful machinery, such as the institution of grand committees and a Council of State. A revising chamber, with all the sanest elements of Indian public life represented in it, partly by election and partly by nomination, and with all the restrictions that have now been imposed upon such a chamber in England, would have cut the Gordian knot of Indian administration, obviated all difficulties and complications, and made responsible government at once possible without any risk. In rejecting the proposal of upper houses for the provinces, Mr. Montagu and Lord Chelmsford observe in their Report (para. 258):—"We bear in mind that, as Provincial councils approach more closely to Parliamentary forms, the need for revising chambers may be the more felt; and we think that the question should be further considered by the periodic Commission which we propose hereafter."

If revising chambers are likely to be necessary later on, why not start the experiment of responsible government with it? The reply that the Secretary of State and the Viceroy give to it seems very unsatisfactory. They say that "in many Provinces it would be impossible to secure a sufficient number of suitable members for two houses," that a revising chamber "might prove too effective a barrier against legislation which affected moneyed and landed interests" and might "discourage" members of the aristocracy "from seeking the votes of the electorates," and, lastly, "the delay involved in passing legislation through two houses would make the system far too cumbrous to contemplate for the business of Provincial legislation." If in no other part of the civilised world have the second, third and fourth reasons been found to be very serious objections to the institution of bi-cameral Legislatures—sometimes they exist in the Provinces also—why they should be so in India it is difficult to comprehend. As regards the first objection, there is now no Province of India where it would at all be difficult to "secure a sufficient number of suitable members for two houses." The rejection of the proposal of upper houses for the Provinces seems the more surprising when one remembers that the constitution of Indian society peculiarly lends itself to such a legislative organisation, and in view of the following significant admissions in the Report itself:—"Its advocates urge that in creating upper houses we should follow the system which generally prevails in countries where popular government has firmly established itself. We might also expect that the representation of minority interests would become more effective in an upper house than in a single composite chamber, because minority representatives sitting in a chamber of their own might feel themselves freer to defend the interests which they represented than if they sat together with other elements in a lower house. We might secure men for the upper houses who would not seek election or even accept nomination to a composite assembly where the majority of members were of a different status from themselves; and so the second chamber might develop a conservative character which would be a valuable check on the possibly too radical proclivities of a lower house." I hope, in the best interests both of India and England, that the Joint Committee will reconsider the whole matter at this stage instead of its being allowed to hang fire till the first periodic Commission proposed in Mr. Monagu's Bill. The postponemen ponement of the institution of bi-cameral Legislatures in the Provinces may jeopardise the whole scheme and throw the experiment into doubtful orientation from the start.

There are some other minor matters which I hope the Joint Committee will not overlook. The Southborough Committee have not been very fair to the educated community per se, to the womenfolk of India, and the Zemindars of Bengal. To start a scheme of popular government with all womenfolk disqualified for suffrage is an outrage upon the basic principle of democratic rule. To give to the Bengal Zemindars—the acknowledged leaders and protectors of the masses—no more seats in a Council of 125 members than they already have in a Council of 50 is an insult to their position and growing intelligence. And as for the educated community, it is a pity that the Southborough Committee, slavishly imitating the case in England, recognise no other qualification for a voter but property. Even in the case of the Universities, it is only the Fellows that will enjoy the right to vote, and not the graduates and the under-graduates, as here. It is difficult to see why, in such a matter the position of the Indian graduates should be differentiated from those of the English Universities.

I would also beg of the Parliamentary Select Committee to go into the whole question of the representation of minorities or backward classes and examine the wisdom and feasibility of instituting either plural constituencies with special seats reserved for them in every Province or a system of proportional representation. There is a great chance in India of the interests of minorities and backward classes being overlooked or trampled upon, and no scheme is likely to give satisfaction which would fail to afford to these classes the protection and the encouragement which they so richly deserve.

In conclusion, I would urge the deletion of Clause 12 and Sub-Clause 2 of 27 of the Bill under consideration. Clause 12 says that the Governor-General will have the power to divide certain Provinces into Deputy Governorships, and "The Governor-General in Council may declare any territory within any Governor's Province to be a 'backward tract,'" etc. I want that all deleted. Then clause 27 (2) says: "Subject to any rules made by the Secretary of State in Council no office may be added to or withdrawn from the public service," etc. I think the Legislative Council in the Province should have the right either to add to their services and fix up their emoluments as best they can, instead of leaving the whole thing to the Governor-General to determine.

Mr. Bennett.

2586. (To Mr. Samarth.) I think you are not a Brahmin?—(Mr. Samarth). No, I am not. I am a non-Brahmin

2587. You have not found that your position in political life or in public life in Bombay Presidency has in any way suffered from that fact?—I am glad to say it has not suffered.

2588. You do not think it is likely to do?—So long as they think I have merit in me I do not think it is likely.

2589. You represented the University on the Bombay Legislative Council?—Yes, by election.

2590. What view would be taken in Bombay of the abolition of the University qualification for a seat on the Council?—In Bombay they are anxious to have a seat reserved no doubt to the Bombay University at present, but in addition they would have one seat thrown open to graduates of a certain standing, graduates for instance who have got the highest degree in any faculty or who have double degrees, or graduates holding one degree of not less than ten years' standing. This was the constituency which until a few years ago elected a certain number of Fellows to the University. I was one of the Fellows elected by this constituency of the Graduates of the University. Then Lord Curzon's Indian Universities Act was passed. Before that Act was passed our tenure of office was a life tenure, but that Act ousted us from the university, and we had to come back to the constituency to seek re-election. That was the last time the constituency was in existence, namely, this larger constituency of Graduates. I had the honour and privilege of being sent at the head of the poll to the university as a fellow by this larger constituency, and I regret, and many people regret, that this constituency has been abolished since. It was about 3,000 votes of the alumni of my University that I had then canvassed.

Mr. Bennett—continued.

2591. You referred to the proposal that the rulers of the Native States shall be eligible for Provincial Councils. Is it not the case that until now questions relating to matters in Native States have been held to be so far out of the purview of the Provincial Legislative Councils that they have always been ruled out of order?—That is one of the standing rules.

2592. You are a man who I know weighs his words. You said that unless the constitution of the Central Government were very much liberalised there would be an agitation which would stagger imagination. Can you suggest what particular action or operation of the Central Government, on the basis proposed here, would provoke such an agitation as you have in view?—I used those words advisedly because of this: You have a Central Government on the Morley-Minto model—that is to say, as constituted as at present—and if legislation is passed by the Executive Government over the head of such an assembly, and ignoring the opinion of such assembly, you can well imagine, having experience of recent agitation, how virulent the agitation in five years' time will be. I think your Lordships' Committee will have in mind the agitation which has recently been set up on account of a certain piece of legislation having been passed in the teeth of the unanimous non-official opposition. If that sort of thing is going to happen hereafter, as it may happen in the case of a Central Legislative Assembly in which the bulk of the people are the elected majority, then I say one can well imagine what the agitation will be and how virulent it will be.

2593. But assuming that we have genuinely liberalised Provincial Legislatures and Executives, is it likely that any action taken by the Central Government, or the policy of the Central Government, would be so provocative as to bring about such an agitation as to stagger imagination? Are not those words a little extravagant?—I hope the Central Government takes a lesson from past experience, and abstains from legislation in the teeth of unanimous non-official opposition, then no such thing will happen.

2594. You are in favour of Grand Committees?—I am.

2595. You attach importance to them—Grand Committees which will have a nominated majority?—A bare majority.

2596. Is it still the case in India that legislators who have been nominated by the Government are under the impression, many of them, that it is their duty to go with the Government always and vote with them?—No.

2597. Was it ever the case?—No.

2598. Do you remember the time when it was the case?—Well, I do not think that all nominated members have that view.

2599. I did not say all. But was there a tendency on the part of people nominated to think it was their duty to vote with the Government?—Yes.

2600. That is a matter of historical fact. Now, with regard to the Parliamentary Commission, you object to the ten years' limit?—For the Parliamentary Commission I accept.

2601. You object to the ten years' limit?—Yes, because in the interval I want a five years' investigation.

2602. What would you want as an appropriate time for instituting these inquiries into the operations of the reformed system of government? You say you would not fix a limit?—No. I accept a limit of five years, which was contained in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report as a period of investigation for the purpose of adding to the transferred subjects, if the Governor of a Province or the Legislature of a Province so recommend it to the Government of India. That I consider sider is essential. After that comes the Parliamentary Commission, after ten years, which I accept, but meanwhile I do not wish to see an advanced Province hampered or prevented from making progress during the ten years.

Duke of Northumberland.

2603. I think you said an impossible situation would arise in the new Provincial Legislatures unless they were given full control of all money estimates?—I made this exception—except with regard to certificated items by the Governor.

2604. I think you said they would refuse the voting of allotments?—Yes, if they had no voice whatever in the reserved allotments of the Government.

2605. Is it your opinion that if the scheme embodied in the Bill is allowed to pass, if it is introduced in its present form, it will be absolutely unsatisfactory, both to the people of India and to their elective representatives?—That is my view, and that is the considered judgment of the delegation here.

2606. And that they would not be content to wait the ten years until the Parliamentary Commission introduced some further measure of reform; they will not be prepared to wait for ten years?—I have not made myself clear. I am talking of the financial proposals, Clause 9 of the Bill.

2607. That is in the Bill; it is all part of the Bill?—That part of the Bill is unsatisfactory; it does not embody the provisions of the Montagu-Chelmsford scheme. If that is so remodelled as to embody those provisions then no doubt it would be satisfactory.

2608. But there is another thing which, according to you, is absolutely unsatisfactory, because you say—Mr. Bennett has quoted your words—that there would be a very widespread agitation unless the Central Government can be liberalised?—Yes.

2609. Therefore, if you take the scheme as it stands it will be absolutely unsatisfactory in very vital respects?—If the scheme, so far as the Provinces are concerned, is given effect to at once, then no doubt there will be a large body of supporters of the scheme, and they will work it in the Provinces. They would, at the same time, be dissatisfied with the absence of further liberalisation in the Central Government; and, further, I ask this Committee to visualise (because that is my personal view from the conditions I know of) what will happen if a large body of mediocre men, forming an elective majority in the Central Legislature, have to exercise merely the powers which are given to them of influencing the Government, and so forth.

2610. I would like to ask Mr. Roy this: You made some remark about the High Commissioner—I think you said to represent Parliament in India?—(Mr. Roy.) No; to represent the Government of India in London for their agency work.

Lord Sinha.

2611. Mr. Samarth, with regard to standing Committees and Under-Secretaries, were you quite correct in saying that the Government of India oppose it with regard to the Local Governments?—(Mr. Samarth.) No; not with regard to Local Governments.

2612. You did not qualify that?—I did not. They do not support the original proposal of the scheme. That is what I meant.

2613. But they do oppose it with regard to the Government of India?—Yes, they do.

2614. May I take it your view is that as regards the Government of India, you desire the institution of Standing Committees and Under-Secretaries, and you desire it with regard to the Provincial Governments also?—Yes.

2615. And with regard to the latter, they should not be left at the discretion of the Governor, but should be instituted in every case?—Yes.

2616. With regard to Grand Committees, you regard Grand Committees as a safeguard against the arbitrary discretion of the Governor?—Yes.

2618. You look at it differently?—Yes.

2619. With regard to what the Duke of Northumberland asked you, did I understand you to say that unless there is an element of responsibility introduced into the Government of India your party do not accept this scheme embodied in the Bill?—No; I do not say that.

2620. But I mean your party does. You suggest as an improvement that there should be the adoption of the principle of responsible government in India; you say it would make it more generally acceptable to the people of India?—Yes.

2621. But without it you would be content to work the scheme in the Bill for all it is worth?—Yes; most certainly.

Mr. Montagu.

2622. You said you wanted to see provision for Under-Secretaries and Standing Committees in the Bill?—Yes.

2623. Supposing this Joint Committee were in its Report to state that they were of opinion that there should be Under-Secretaries and Standing Committees, and supposing that Report were accepted by Parliament, that would be good enough for you, would it not?—Provided it is obligatory upon each Provincial Governor to resort to that procedure.

2624. Can you conceive a Provincial Governor not appointing Under-Secretaries and Standing Committees if Parliament were to lay it down that he should appoint them?—No; not if Parliament laid it down that he should.

2625. I think it was Mr. Chintamani who said that he would like to see the list of transferred and reserved subjects in the Statute?—(Mr. Chintamani.) Scheduled to the Bill.

2626. Then, later on, I think you said you wanted provision made for increase of the transferred subjects in five years. If they are in the Bill, if they are in the Statute, would not that mean a new Statute at the end of five years?—Not necessarily. Lists of reserved and transferred subjects would be given in a Schedule, and instead of the proviso there is to Sub-Clause 2 of Clause 1 there would be a proviso that: "It shall be within the power of the Governor-General in Council, at the end of five years, to receive applications from Provincial Governments or Legislatures for a variation of these lists, and after such inquiry as he may be disposed to make, and with the concurrence of the Secretary of State, the appended lists may be varied in that manner."

Lord Sinha.

2627. Extended or curtailed?—I said "May be varied" so as to include both.

Mr. Montagu.

2628. Have you discovered in this Bill as it is in print anything that prevents the alteration at any time of the rules embodying the transferred subjects?—No; I have not seen that, but I would again invite your attention to the language of this proviso: "Provided that without prejudice to any general power of revoking or altering rules under the principal Act, the rules shall not authorise the revocation or suspension of the transfer of any subject, except with the sanction of the Secretary of State in Council."

2629. I quite appreciate that. That is a special proviso with regard to the suspension or revocation of the transfer, but there is nothing in the Bill, in your opinion, which prevents the increase of transfer by rules at any time?—If you will excuse my saying so, there is nothing to prevent an increase, but the experience we have in Indian administration leads us to think that there will not be an increase.

2630. You are not complaining of the Bill but of your experience?—I judge the Bill in the light of our experience, and we want provisions in the Bill which we shall regard as safeguards against a repetition of that experience.

2631. Do you suggest that in drawing up a constitution there is no necessity for a power of re-transfer?—I do not suggest it.

Mr. Montagu—continued.

2632. In your evidence you said that under the financial arrangement the United Provinces suffered most?—After Madras.

2634. You do not really mean that the United Provinces and Madras suffer most? You mean that nothing is done to mitigate the suffering which they are already exposed to?—That is exactly what I mean. I quoted the language of the Report on this continuance of existing inequalities.

2635. Do you suggest, Mr. Samarth, that the Government should be deprived of its power of legislating when it has not got a majority of the elected members of the Legislative Assembly?—(Mr. Samarth) No, I do not suggest that.

2636. You do not look forward to a reform which will prevent the Government, to use your own words, legislating in the teeth of the majority?—No, I would not; I would have safeguards.

2637. Has the party to which you belong ever considered the possibility of a Council of State whose only function is that of a revising chamber, nominated for a term of years?—On that the opinion of our party is divided.

2638. Has your party ever considered the question of giving to the Governor of a Province the power o ordinance instead of a Grand Committee?—That was considered.

2639. And rejected?—And rejected.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

2640. You laid great stress on there being no piecemeal treatment of finance reforms. Do you mean you do not like the division of finance between two parties, or do you mean that you want the whole of the finance to be under the control of the Legislative Assembly?—In both senses I use it. The meaning of the expression was this: You cannot treat finance as though one portion was absolutely outside the control of the Legislature, and only a small portion, or another portion coming under the control of the Legislature. That is fundamentally my objection to it.

2641. Are you aware that even in the British Parliament some portions of finance are outside the control of the House of Commons?—Yes.

2642. That is the Consolidated Fund?—Yes.

2643. Do not you think you are asking more for the Indian Legislature than has been found workable here for a great number of years in the British Parliament?—I answered that in my evidence. I said that there is no analogy between the two, because, as a matter of fact, you have the Consolidated Fund which we have also in the Bill—permanent charges such as fixed payments to the Government of India, interest on the public debt, and so forth, which will have to be set aside. That will be our Consolidated Fund under the scheme. Then in Parliament you have got annual taxation which we have not got in the proposed Bill. Some taxes are annually voted upon. The whole Executive is removable from office. In the absence of that you cannot go in for the whole of Parliamentary procedure in a diarchal form of Government.

2644. You are not afraid of over-weighting these new Parliaments with finance, in the first instance, at the very start?—I do not think the scheme, if given effect to, will over-weight them.

2645. Are you aware that in all our municipal bodies in this country a considerable amount of finance is reserved by the Central Government? Do you know that is so?—Yes.

2646. Take the City of London, the largest municipality in the world, do you know that in many points the finance—I mean the whole County of London—is under the control of the Government?—I have heard that question put. I have no personal knowledge of the working of finance here.

2647. I will take one point. Do you advocate for these new assemblies that they should have the control of the finance of the police? Would you consider that they ought to have the power of voting or not voting the police finances?—Yes, I do mean it; I mean whatever powers we exercise at present should not be curtailed. The whole of the Budget is placed before the Legislative Council at present. Each member in charge of a branch brings forward his proposals and they are voted upon.

2648. Take the County of London, with seven million inhabitants. You will admit, I suppose, that the general level of education of the inhabitants of London is higher than that of the country districts in India?—Well, I thank I may admit that.

2649. You claim for these Provincial Assemblies the control of the finance of the police; they must vote it every year. Do you know that in the County of London, although it votes large sums, and has to pay large sums to the police, the whole administration of the police is in the hands of the Government, and the whole of the expense is in the hands of the Government; it is not in the hands of those who vote it?—But the scheme is this: The estimated expenditure on the police would be one of the items of the Budget. It will be brought forward by the member in charge of the police department, that is a reserved department, before the Legislative Council. The vote of the Legislative Council on that will be taken. If the vote is so perverse or absurd that the Governor thinks the estimate must be restored, he will have power to restore it, but if it is not so perverse and only lowers it by a few thousands, the Governor may accept it. Except in regard to peace, tranquility or reserved subjects, in which the certificate is valid, all other uncertificated items or allotments shall be voted upon and the vote of the Legislative Council shall be given effect to. That is the scheme.

2650. Do not you think that the newly-created Provincial Assemblies might be well content to have the same sort of powers as is given to the greatest municipality in the world, namely, London, in regard to these matters?—I am sorry I am unable to answer that because I have no first-hand knowledge of financial matters in London.

2651. I know you feel strongly about the principle, but in practice what are you afraid of if a certain amount of the finance is not in the hands of the Assembly? Are you afraid that certain services will not be provided for; if so, what sort of services?—Not services. I gave this instance: I was speaking of a financial arrangement in which one-half of the finances, or some portion of them, will be allocated over the head of the Legislature, without the Legislature having any voice in voting upon them; that is to say, a separate purse. I had in my mind a separate purse.

2652. I am not talking of a separate purse; I am taking your contention that all finance ought practically to come under the purview of the Assembly. I am asking you, are you afraid of any service being starved if that is not done, and if so, which?—I took the question of taxation. My anxiety is as to a growing department, which will be a transferred department, education, agriculture, industry, sanitation, that will require more money, and therefore taxation proposals will have to be brought before the Legislature, and if the Legislature has to vote them it must satisfy itself that there is no extravagance of expenditure going on in the reserved departments. In order that it may assent, it must have the opportunity to assess the expenditure on the reserved departments and vote upon it. The vote of the Legislature, if it is absurd or perverse, will be set aside, but in all other respects, if the Legislature is satisfied that there is no extravagance going on, it will vote the extra taxation.

2653. You are apprehensive that the reserved department, and those concerned with it, will obtain some sort of preference as compared with transferred department?—Speaking personally, I am not apprehensive, but I say the system must be such that no reasonable ground should be given to the Legislature to say that it has no voice in the particular branch of the expenditure in which it may suspect, rightly or wrongly, that there is extravagant expenditure going on.

2654. You spoke of the question of the five years transition, and I gather from your remarks that you are anxious those new Assemblies should do the best possible work?—Yes.

2655. Do you think any Assembly will concentrate on the work if all the time they are thinking about what should be done at the end of five years in the way of new powers?—Certainly; I can only speak of Bombay. I am perfectly certain that the Bombay Legislative Council will concentrate its attention and show its capacity and judgment in regulating and controlling the departments transferred to it, with the result that it will make out a case that at the end of five years there must be more departments transferred. I feel certain about that so far as my Presidency is concerned.

2656. Do not you think that with the Bill before you, if you are thinking the whole time of what powers you will get by-and-by, that will blind you to the very large amount of work there is to be done under those powers you have got?—I pointed out that our Government was desirous of reserving only a few Departments and transferring the others. The Functions Committee has not given us that. Why should our Government be prevented after five years from doing what it is willing and ready to do now at the start?

2657. Have you ever heard of a constitution being reconsidered after so short a period as five years?—Conditions in India necessitate this. If precedents alone are to be relied upon I am afraid no precedents can be found for this sort of thing.

2658. You base yourself upon what has been given to other people—the Colonies, and so on. Do not you think you must consider that?—I did not carry my analogy with the Colonies so far.

Lord Sydenham.

2659. You represent the Moderate Party?—Yes.

2660. Has it any organisation covering all India?—There is the Western India Liberal Association for Bombay and the United Provinces Liberal Association, the Madras Liberal League, the Bengal National Liberal League and the Central Provinces National Liberal Association.

2661. These are all new bodies?—Yes.

2662. We are told the electorate of the Congress was the whole of British India. You now claim part of that electorate on the side of the Moderates?—Yes, newly created.

2663. Therefore the Congress is in a sense split?—Yes, there is a split in the Congress.

2664. We were told there was no split. You understand that? I think your administrative experience was mainly gained in Baroda?—That is my brother. I am a lawyer by profession.

2665. It is your brother, I remember. You have spoken about the Native States, so you have some knowledge?—Yes.

2666. In a Native State are not the whole of the Executive experienced persons who have either been brought up in that State, and worked their way up to the top or been selected with great care from the outside?—Yes; that is so.

2668. For the reason that they were very experienced servants?—Yes; besides, they had it all their own way, and they were not subject to the caprice of autocracy.

2669. Are you certain, that by the wholesale transfer of very important and complicated services to Ministers who must have no experience, this great progress that you expect will be accomplished in five years?—I do think so; in Bombay, I do think so.

2670. I suppose you understand perfectly that you are setting up a kind of Government which has no parallel in any Presidency in India?—Yes; I have realised that, but I do think so.

2671. We were told that the effect of civil servants has been to stunt the development of the people. Do you see a great difference in the people of any Native State where civil servants exercise no power? The Indian civil servant has nothing to do with Native States except they are sometimes called in to help. Do you see any difference in the absence of this stunting effect in the people of Native States?—No; the people of the Native States are better situated in this respect that they consider their government to be self-government.

2672. That is not an answer to my question. If the stunting effect has had such a serious result as we have been told——?—I cannot follow it.

Chairman.] It was not Mr. Samarth who used that word, was it?

Lord Sydenham.] No.

Chairman.] Lord Sydenham's point is that another witness said that the Indian civil servants had in British India had the effect of stunting the development of the people of India.

Lord Sydenham.

2673. (To the Witness.) Have you noticed a difference in the people in Native States where this stunting process does not go on?—That assumes the truth of the remark that the stunting process is going on in British India.

2674. You think there is no stunting process?—Not on account of that. The stunting process is on account of the higher rungs of the ladder not being open to us.

2675. I think you said you were in favour of Grand Committees?—Yes.

2676. If the Government has a certain majority on a Grand Committee what is the use of it?—No use.

Chairman.] Did you say if it had or had not a certain majority?

Lord Sydenham.

2677. If it had. (To the Witness.) If the Grand Committee has, ex hypothesi, a certain majority on the side of the Government, what use is it?—It is no use.

2678. Then what sort of Grand Committee do you contemplate?—A Grand Committee as described in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, in which there shall be a bare majority, exclusive of the Governor, in favour of the Government.

2679. If you have a bare majority the thing is settled, is it not?—No. The majority consists of this: The Grand Committee is to consist of 40 to 50 per cent. of the Legislature; it is to be constituted ad hoc. Say half of it to be elected by the Legislature, the other half to be nominated by the Governor, with one more added to give him a bare majority over the elected.

2680. If the majority was effective, as it is intended to be apparently, the Grand Committee would be of no use whatever, would it?—I question the use of the Grand Committee as a device for the purpose of giving to the Governor only the affirmative power of legislation.

2681. Then you are ready to give up your support of the Grand Committee?—No. I am in favour of the Grand Committee with a bare majority.

2682. You said no men of talent and ability would ever come to the Legislative Council of the Government of India unless certain conditions were fulfilled. Have no men of talent and ability been attracted to the Legislative Assembly in present circumstances?—Certainly, in both the deliberative Assemblies; but when, under the new scheme, opportunities of service and distinction will be thrown open to the people of capacity in the Provinces then they will be attracted to the Provinces unless there are similar opportunities thrown open to them in the Central Government.

2683. Surely the position and the powers of the Legislative Councils in India under the Bill will be considerably greater than they are now, even if they are not so great as you desire?—Not in the Central Government.

2684. Greater than they are now?—Not in the Central Government, which is merely a Morley-Minto model.

2685. You think the Bill does nothing to give any power to the Legislative Assembly?—Except having an elected majority.

2686. You

2686. You spoke in serious terms of the gigantic agitation which you expected. Who will conduct and manage that agitation?—I cannot say who will. The men will come with the times.

2687. Will it be the same people as those who engineered the agitation against the Rowlatt Bill?—It may be the same people; it all depends upon the attitude of the Government.

2688. Would you take part in that agitation?—If it comes to that I may.

2689. It is quite impossible that the 96 per cent. of illiterate people in India can organise such a tremendous agitation on their own account. They could not do it, could they?—During the past five years rapid strides have been made in that direction; I do not know what may happen five or ten years hence.

2690. You think the masses could organise this great agitation on their own account?—Not unless they have leaders.

Sir J. D. Rees.

2691. I gather you are opposed to a separate purse; you accept the recommendations of the Report?—Yes.

2692. You are a representative of the highest intelligentia, are you not?—That is more than I can say.

2693. You represent a University?—Yes.

2694. Is the opinion generally held that a separate purse would deprive the Indians of any control over finance?—Yes.

2695. The contributions from Madras and the United Provinces to the Central Government have come under criticism, either by yourself or by some of the cross-examiners. Could not that inequality be to some extent redressed by levying in Bengal some other tax which would enable this contribution to be equal to its position, population and wealth, and so relieve the other two great populous Provinces from the necessity of paying such a very disproportionate amount?—I am afraid I am not in a position to answer that. I have not considered that aspect.

2696. As you have said, in answer to Mr. Bennett, I gather from your answer that you are yourself not of opinion that the acceptance of these reforms means the handing over of power to a tyrannical Brahmin or other oligarchy which will oppress other people?—No.

2697. In asking questions from a witness, designed to elicit a similar answer, I asked whether the rulers of Native States were ever Brahmins. In examining subsequent witnesses, Lord Sydenham said: "Are there not eleven Native States under Brahmin rulers in Bombay?" I want to ask you whether there are not in Bombay some hundreds of petty native States which do not really count as such, and whether those eleven are of any importance whatsoever as Native States?—I think seven or eight of them are really important Native States.

2698. Are they large?—Yes.

2699. Are they known as Native States outside Bombay?—They are the Southern Mahratta States.

2700. Are you aware that those who conducted Dr. Nair's agitation in Madras, described themselves as including Zemindars and landowners and persons owning the bulk of the property in the Province, paying practically the whole of the taxes collected?—I am not conversant with the Madras conditions.

2701. You were asked some questions about Native States by Lord Sydenham just now. Do you attribute no importance to the personality of the Chiefs. Have they not been able administrators with the interests of their people at heart?—Yes; some of them have been.

2702. Not many? Is it not a common occurrence?—Prominent Princes have been able administrators, no doubt, but I do not know that it is desirable to answer the rest of the question.

2703. You were also asked a question implying that Civil Servants had no influence in Native States. Seeing that British residents are either Civil Servants or Military civilians brought up on the same lines would you say they have no influence in Native States?—They have their influence according to the usual official routine.

2704. They have some influence?—Yes. That is within their jurisdiction and powers.

2705. Are they not in most cases empowered under treaty to offer advice which must be accepted?—Yes; that is in the case of some of the Indian States, not all.

2706. As regards Grand Committees you prefer the scheme of the Report to the recommendations of the Government of India?—Yes.

2707. Would you enlighten the Committee as to which amongst Local Governments you consider the "dullest boy." That was your own expression?—I am not in a position to characterise any of the others, but I only claim that Bombay is the most advanced.

2708. Mr. Chintamani, you belong to the North-West Provinces and Oudh?—(Mr. Chintamani.) At present. I am a Madrasi.

2709. You have spoken for the United Provinces?—Yes.

2710. You know Sir John Hewett, the distinguished Lieutenant-Governor is about to give evidence before this Committee?—I hear it from you.

2711. His opinions, I have reason to believe from his writings, are not those which you have expressed?—I believe not.

2712. Can you explain that? Have you any explanation how it happens that that distinguished officer is not in favour of these reforms?—His point of view is not the same as ours. His point of view is that of an administrator, a permanent official who attaches more importance to order than to progress. Our point of view is to obtain a legitimate share in the government of the country for ourselves, and to come into line with advanced nations.

2713. Even if progress led to impairing the efficiency of the Government, you are still in favour of it?—Assuming it would lead to impaired efficiency, which I do not admit in fact.

2714. You said the control of the Secretary of State over the Government of India was rather vague and shadowy?—I said the control of Parliament was vague and shadowy.

2715. To what do you attribute that fact?—From all that I have heard, read and observed, I attribute it to equal ignorance and indifference.

2716. May it not equally be the confidence which Parliament, with more knowledge of the subject, feels in particular officers who hold the office of Secretary of State?—It is possible. I do not think it is often the case that that is the reason.

2717. You feel that the explanation does not commend itself to you?—It is not adequate.

2718. Mr. Roy, with regard to the opinions that you laid before the Committee, whose opinions were you expressing and whom do you represent?—(Mr. Roy.) I belong to the Moderate Party, but in giving my evidence I was only supplementary to Mr. Samarth, and in some cases I represented my own views. I have used the word "I" always.

2719. Were they representative of anybody?—Yes.

2720. Are you a Press representative?—Yes.

2721. Were you speaking on behalf of the Press or the Moderate Party?—Mostly the Moderate Party, blended with my own views.

Chairman. Thank you, gentlemen.

(The Witnesses are directed to withdraw.)

(After a short adjournment.)

SARDAR THAKER SINGH is called in; and Examined, as follows:—

Chairman.

2722. You are a Sikh?—I am.

2723. And you have come specially to give evidence?—Not on that account.

2724. You are in a position to speak for the Sikh community?—I am in a position. I come here on my own account, but, of course, I represent my people.

Chairman—continued.

2725. Do you wish to make a statement?—Yes.

2726. If you please?—I would like this opportunity to say this much, my Lord, that the notice given to me for my evidence was, compared with the subject, too short. On Friday morning I was, on inquiry, told that there was no knowing whether my evidence would be taken at all; but I was in the afternoon informed that I am to be examined to-day. Thus I have had practically one day only. I have thus had no time to study the complicated questions with regard to the form of Government, etc., and would therefore confine my remarks to Lord Southborough's proposals only. I would beg to submit at the same time that I am not a politician, and so I am only to deal with subjects which are concerned with practical questions. I have the honour to belong to a family of soldiers. Two of us have been recently in France for four years, and are still in Mesopotamia serving as officers with the Lancers. I have myself worked in the Settlement Department, and have done general revenue, magisterial, and a little bit of executive work as well. Thus, whatever little I say will be from practical experience.

Coming now to the practical side of the proposals. (1) Qualifications for voters. First, as to the revenue limit, it is a question that does not particularly concern the Sikhs alone, but it is of equal importance to all landowners alike. The limit of fifty rupees is apparently very high, and I can assure the Committee, from personal experience, that under this limit village after village, especially in more populated districts, is sure to go unrepresented excepting, of course, through their privileged voters. This is sure to be resented, because it is evident from the statement itself, that out of 65,000 in number 50,000 Headmen or Lamberdar will be such as will have to be excluded under this limit if they are to be included in that list. This shows that some headmen, with no position in reality, and income-tax payers who are looked down upon by the landed classes, will get a thing which men of comparatively real importance may not get at all. Then the number of voters would be little less than 1 per cent. of the total rural population, while for the urban it would be a little over 3 per cent., though I think it would actually come out to more than that, because townspeople know how to get in. Anyhow, as the figures stand, the townspeople would get nearly two-thirds more compared with the rural classes, and this the latter are sure to feel. In fact I may be allowed to say that the time has come when every class realises its position. The agriculturists cannot be expected to be an exception to this general rule, especially when their soldier sons, with new ideas and new aspirations acquired during their stay in the Western atmosphere, are among them to influence almost every sphere of their life. The chief objection against the lowering of the revenue limit seems to be an apprehension of making the electorate unmanageable; but I would submit that even if the number of votes in rural areas were double that of urban, I am of opinion that still the former will take less time than the latter—at least in the preparation of the electoral register. I would therefore suggest, in the interest of making the representation real, that the revenue limit should be brought down. As to giving votes to village and rural notables, I would like to submit—and I do this only to explain the situation to the Committee, otherwise it does not particularly concern my community—that if their intention be to make the representation real, if the desire be that voting should not be subject to any pressure, if the idea be to arouse interest in the system and to train the people for still higher responsibilities, and, above all, to keep the harmonious relations in villages intact, then the qualification should generally be one and the same for each and every individual, and there should be no exceptions in favour of any particular class.

(3) As to the qualification of income tax, if it includes Government servants, as I think it does, I would like to submit that it would be to the interest of the Administration as well as to the object of giving these votes that Government officials should be given no votes in places where they are stationed in their official capacity. When the number of officials on local boards is being deliberately cut down, their entry into a new system may, I am afraid, produce consequences which are being felt now in local bodies. As to the ordinary income tax payer, there are strong objection against his inclusion in rural constituencies. This class consists chiefly of money-lenders, though some are traders as well. They have very little in common with landowners. As a rule the agriculturists have a great dislike for them, but, nevertheless, cannot at present get on without their help. This class is as a whole wealthy and can afford to spend as much as the occasion may demand, only if they could secure some means to win their declining prestige. They are now wonderfully organised, and do make their voice heard and their influence felt. Under those circumstances I am not only of opinion but feel as sure as anything that some if not many of the seats are sure to be captured by this class. The natural result is therefore expected to be the frustration of the object for which these separate electorates have been created. I would consequently urge upon your Lordships' Committee that this class like commerce and industry should be transferred to some other constituency.

(4) As to communal representation, the past history of the Councils in the Province of the Punjab proves that any scheme which does not make specific provision for the adequate representation of Sikhs can be of little use to them. They have seldom been able to get a member elected to the Provincial Council and they have seldom been able to get any such member on the Municipal Committee of Amritsar, where they have, although in a minority, much at stake. If any further proof were required I would refer to the discussion in the Provincial Council, where a very simple request on the part of our members to add to the resolution the words "subject to the just claims of the Sikhs" was refused by our Hindoo as well as Mahommedan brethren, and why? Because we did not go to the Congress League platform, as one of the members said in his arguments. We are prepared to plead guilty to the charge, if charge it can be, that we have so far taken little part in the deliberations of the Congress, but surely this could hardly be a reason to refuse even to consider our just demands. Nobody would be more glad than the Sikhs themselves to dispense with communal representation when the time comes, but under the circumstances we feel compelled to say that the scheme can be of benefit and help to the Sikhs only if an adequate number of seats is reserved for them.

(5) Then comes the question of representation. The basis for the distribution of seats is said to be in the case of Sikhs the census enumeration plus their political importance, but the Sikhs are of opinion that in practice the allotment goes by their correct number alone, because they believe, and they think that the Government knows it is well, that our number was not correctly turned out at the last census. There were reasons for all this, but I would like to submit only this much from personal experience, that not only bona fide, but deliberate mistakes have been committed in favour of Hindoos. Then, an impartial eye would at once see that Northern and Western districts of the Province, like Moltan, Muzzoforgah, etc., consist of with few exceptions people who belong to the Sikh faith, and yet they have been shown as Hindoos. The case outside the Punjab seems to have been worse, because little trouble appears to have been taken in studying this question. For instance, we have several lakhs of our co-religionists in the Bombay Presidency, the United Provinces, the Central Provinces, and Behar, besides our big Talukdars in Oudh, and yet we find no mention made of them anywhere, and, apparently, no safeguards provided to protect their interests. Anyhow, the Sikhs believe this question of enumeration has not met with the treatment which its importance to them required. Under this impression my community is of opinion that as far as the Punjab is concerned the correct enumeration would bring their number to a much higher figure than what it has been shown at present. This leads them, therefore, to the inevitable conclusion that the number of seats assigned to them go by their correct enumeration, plus a little less. I submit, therefore, that if it were declared in plain words that the census were the only criterion for representation in the affairs of the State, although I feel compelled to say that never before in any period of Indian history has this principle ever been recognised, then the Sikhs will try to feel themselves contented, because it will at least spare them many unwelcome and unpalatable remarks at the hands of those of our advanced brethren who do not look upon our political attitude with favour. But when it is said, my Lord, that our services and political importance do count we consider ourselves entitled to ask in what way and what have we been given?

given? We appreciate that the principle has been recognised, and so the only thing I would like to submit is that justice demands that the distribution of responsibilities in the civil administrations of the country ought, if not wholly at least approximately, to go with the quota which each community contributes towards its preservation. Taking our stand on this principle, I say that my community has put in nearly one-third of the total forces recruited from the whole of the Indian Empire, but we find that only nine seats out of 83, or 61 elected in the Provincial Council, one out of 80 in the Legislative Assembly, and one out of 24 in the Council of State, are proposed to be given to us. Leaving alone even the question of the last two, we find ourselves in a hopeless minority in the Provincial Councils. Our members here will, even with the impartial official votes, hardly be able to carry through any measure which may concern the Sikhs and the Sikhs alone. Under these circumstances it is requested that our case may, with due regard to our interests at stake, our status before the annexation of the Provinces, and our past and present services to the Empire, be kindly considered, and a representation that may be adequate, effective and consistent with our position be given to us.

(6) There is a very important point with regard to the declaration. I would like to bring to the notice of your Lordships' Committee a point which is of vital importance to the Sikhs. It is the difficulty recognised in Lord Southborough's Report of distinguishing between some classes of Sikhs and Hindoos. It has been suggested in the Report that the officer responsible for preparing the electoral roll should accept the declaration of an elector unless he is satisfied to the contrary; but the interests of the Sikhs demands that when a doubt arises in the case of a candidate standing for a Sikh constituency the question should be referred to the Chief Khalsa Dewan, the representative body of the Sikhs, or to a special committee consisting of Sikhs of recognised position. I think only such a body can be the best judges. Unless a provision is made to that effect I am afraid that men of other communities will creep in, with the result that the object of the grant of communal representation to the Sikhs would be frustrated.

(7) As regards the constituency, the only point where the Sikhs are to feel its pinching—and very strongly, too—is where the rural and urban people are put in one and the same constituency. It is, in the first place, apprehended by the Sikhs that their position is being undermined in different ways, thanks to the sagacity of some of our Judicial Courts. Any man with some influence in the town can pose as a Sikh and stand up as a candidate. The voters living within a small area can be easily influenced and their votes secured. On the other hand rural votes would be scattered far and wide. Thus the latter would in no case be able to compete with the former. Thus we fear that the rural seats may be captured by urban people. In the second place, as mentioned by the Local Government itself, the interests of the two sections are quite apart from each other. One knows nothing at all about the affairs of the other, and consequently the election of the one is sure to be detrimental to the interests of the other. I would therefore suggest that the two classes may be kept apart from each other; the interests of the agriculturist are otherwise sure to suffer in the long run.

(8) The only subject on which depends the whole future of the agricultural classes is the revenue. It does not concern the Sikhs alone, but all landowners of whatever caste or creed they may be have their all attached to it. I would be failing in my duty if I were not to bring to the notice of your Lordships' Committee that, although it is a fact that this class is not only from the economic point of view the mainstay of the nation, but supplies men and material for the protection of the country as well, and yet by an irony of fate it is this class whose lot is at present the most unenviable one. The less said the better will it be, and so I would submit only this much, that my personal experience, derived from having constantly remained in touch with allmost all classes in the Punjab, tells me that this class as a whole has reached a point where the interest of all parties concerned demands a change of attitude in connection with the land revenue policy of the Government, and suggests that means should be devised to raise if necessary taxation from sources other than land. But this can be done only if the Revenue Department is controlled by a person acquainted with the difficulties of this class. I would under those circumstances submit that in case revenue be a transferred subject, it should be put under the charge of a man who personally knows the conditions of the agricultural class, and if it remains on the reserved list it should be under the control of one who has seen for himself how the persons concerned with it feel the pressure from all sides.

(9) The only question now remaining is the question of Women's Suffrage. As to this, I would like, in order to avoid any misunderstanding, to bring to the notice of your Lordships' Committee that the Sikhs regard their women as their equals. We have practically no purdah system among us, and our very religion places women on an equality with men. We are as much solicitous for the welfare of our girls as we are for that of our boys. It may interest your Lordships' Committee to hear that, although in a minority, we have at present more high schools for girls than any other community. Anybody who has been to our annual Education Conference would attest that out of the whole audience of several thousands of people coming from far and wide, nearly one-third consists of our women. Moreover, they do not come as mere spectators, but take an active part in our deliberations as well. Nevertheless, it is a fact that we feel we are yet far off from that stage which may make us even to look for votes under that head. The division of our duties is such that both parties feel quite satisfied with the present arrangement. Our women would not like to enter into the domain of their male protectors, and the very idea looks to them a strange one. Very few in the present state of society are expected to avail themselves of the opportunity even if it be given to them. Plainly speaking, the prejudice pertaining to questions like this is so strong that I know of examples in which highly-placed and educated gentlemen would prefer to forego the benefits of the scheme rather than give out the names of their wives. We therefore think that this question should at present be left alone.

That is the evidence I have to offer, my Lord.

2727. I know we gave you rather short notice, and I am sorry that was so; but if anything occurs to you that you would have wished to have said you have only got to put in a Memorandum afterwards?—Thank you.

Lord Sydenham.

2728. I think you told us that the Sikhs were not properly enumerated in the Census?—Yes; that is the fact.

2729. Why is that; what made it wrong?—In the first place, this question is rather a complicated one, in one way, because we are all intermingled with each other. Then there are certain parties who know that the more our number becomes the more they will be losing, and so they will not like that the correct number of Sikhs themselves should be allowed to stand in that way. Then we have two sections; one is the Sahjdaris, and the others are called Singhs, so that the Sikhs include two sections, one the Sahjdaris Sikhs and the other the Singhs. One take to shaving and the other party have got hair on their head like myself. We have got these two sections, but the majority consists of the Sahjdaris. The idea was that those who have got hair on their heads were to be enumerated as Sikhs, so that the other party is left alone in that way and included among Hindoos. Now the difficulty is that when anybody, may he be a Sahjdari or what, goes to a judicial court he can get himself declared a Sikh.

2730. What do you think is the main cause of the great agitation which was begun in India during the Great War?—I would not like to answer that question in public, probably because it might throw some reflection.

2731. You would rather not answer that question in public?—I would rather not, with your permission.

2732. You are aware that there will be a great increase of the Indian Civil Service from Indians, and that in a short time, perhaps six years, something like 60 per cent. of the higher appointments of the present

Civil Service will he held by Indians. In that great increase, do you think the Sikhs will get a fair chance of a proper representation in it?—I have not been able to study the scheme that is to come into force, but if it has made any provision to safeguard the interests of any special community, then the Sikhs may, to some extent, be protected.

2733. If it rested purely with competitive examination you think that would not give justice to the Sikhs?—I will not say to the Sikhs; it may only apply to certain classes, because we are now a little bit far advanced.

Chairman.

2734. I do not think "justice" is quite the word; it may be expedient or inexpedient, but your point is that the system of competitive examination would result in few Sikhs getting into the Civil Service; is that your opinion?—What I mean to say, my Lord, is that I have not studied that point, and I do not know whether the examination is to be for the whole of India or whether there is to be any provision with regard to the Provinces.

2735. Your answer would depend a good deal upon that?—Yes.

2736. I think you told us that you regard the political power of the towns as too great?—Yes, it is, compared with rural.

2738. Are the interests of the town dwelling politicians identical with those of the rural population?—If I were to speak from the circumstances which are at present prevailing, then the agricultural classes are disappointed in the townspeople in different ways. So far nobody seems to have taken up their cause and to give what they want, so that it will be by a sacrifice if the townspeople are going to get more and more.

2739. In all the local bodies in local self-government do the Sikhs get what they would consider a proper measure of representation?—As far as elections are concerned we have not been getting anything at all; but the Government has been making certain provisions; for instance, Amritsar has now got probably three seats reserved for the Sikhs. In that way provisions are being made to assist.

2740. But unless the Government had made these special provisions the Sikhs would have come off badly?—Up to the present we are backward in that way.

2741. Is it not the case that the cultivating classes are always working very hard, and have not much time to devote to politics?—That is quite true. I should say that, notwithstanding their working hard from morning to night, sometimes they do not get even time to sleep, and they have got certain bills and certain things which I would not like to speak of now.

2742. That is why the political power tends to fall into the hands of the town-dwellers?—Yes. My point is this: That the village people are suffering because they have nobody to speak for their cause. If the town leaders had taken up their cause they perhaps would not have suffered to such an extent 2743. Considering the enormous preponderance in India of the agricultural population and the classes living on the land, you would not think any scheme of reforms would be satisfactory unless it gave sufficient power to that large cultivating class?—That is quite true.

2744. Then you do not think agriculture will benefit if it is transferred to a popular Minister who might very probably be a town-dweller also?—In that case it would not.

Mr. Spoor.

2745. The only question I would like to ask is with regard to your statement about Women's Suffrage. We have had, as you know, a number of witnesses here, and I think you are the first Indian witness who has expressed himself as definitely opposed to Women's Suffrage. Did you hear the statement made by Mrs. Naidu?—No.

2746. And you have not read the Memorandum that she put in?—I would like simply to know what you mean to refer to?

2747. Her argument was that the women of India

were all well qualified to exercise the vote, and not only that, but that there was a very real desire amongst many of the women in India to have the Franchise?—In the first place, whatever I have said I have said with regard to the women belonging to the agricultural classes.

2748. You speak simply regarding the rural areas?—That is so.

2749. You do not express any general opinion on the question?—As I said, I can give an example in which a gentleman whose name I could give, belonging to one of the educated families and holding one of the higher appointments in the Punjab, declined to give out the name of his wife to the Accountant-General rather than have the benefit of the second scheme.

2750. I hope that is not a general attitude?—I am simply telling you that there are some educated people as well in the towns who are against it.

2751. You yourself are not personally opposed to votes for women, are you?—As far as the agricultural classes are concerned, I am.

Mr. Montagu.

2752. Would you give us a rough shot at what you think the number of Sikhs is in the Punjab? You say that the census enumeraton is wrong?—We generally think that it would be nearly double to what it has been shown to be.

2753. It is now nearly 11 per cent.; the representation given by the Southborough Report to the Sikhs is to be nine members out of sixty-one?—Yes.

2754. Do you think that is not sufficient?—What I mean to impress upon you is this: That that 11 per cent. consists of the Singhs, just as I have explained, and not the Sahjdari Sikhs; and when that class (Sahjdari) is included among the Singhs, then even this is not sufficient.

2755. Supposing one considers communal representation for the Sikhs, as was recommended in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report and in the Southborough Report, would the whole of your community be willing to accept as Sikhs those gentlemen to whom you refer who are not enumerated in the census?—You will excuse me if I do not quite follow.

2756. You referred to the Sikhs who cut their hair?—Yes.

2757. And you suggested that if you really wanted to find out how many Sikhs there were you should include those?—Yes.

2758. What would the orthodox Sikhs say to their inclusion?—But there is a difficulty which perhaps I have not been able to explain myself in that way. The Judicial Courts are including this second class (Sahjdari) among us. The Sikhs are at present given representation for the "Singhs." The "Sahjdaris" have their number included among the "Hindoos." Thus, the "Singhs" lose the benefit of the number of their "Sahjdari" brethren, while they are now ordered to share whatever they have got, or are expecting, with the latter (Sahjdari). The question is, if we are left alone just as at present, they are giving us representation for the Sikhs; we are not getting any advantage from their numbering, and we are going to lose what we have got.

2759. You were telling Lord Sydenham, I think, that the people who live in towns have an undue share in political life in India at the present moment?—Yes.

2760. They count for too much; do you not say so?—In a sense.

2761. We complain of that in this country too. Will you just give me an instance of something that the rural classes want very much that those who dwell in towns have not taken up on their behalf?—For instanee, on the particular question of revenue, unless you were to change that policy with regard to the revenue system, village people are going to have nothing at all. They cannot attend to sanitation, and if you were to say that they should be under compulsory education it would be no use to them, because nowadays their children, when they are six or seven years of age, have to help their fathers in the agricultural work, and if they are forced to go to school the agricultural work will suffer. So, unless that policy is changed I think nothing will be of any use for the agricultural classes.

Mr. Montagu—continued.

2762. You do not want compulsory education?—I simply say that unless you put them in a position to avail themselves of that compulsory education, it would be of no use to them. What I mean to say is this, that a man who is earning his living has no time to spend in other places, and when a child has to help his father in his ordinary work if he disappears from that work, of course the father will suffer—rather, starve.

2763. That is a Revenue problem?—Yes.

2764. It is really Revenue?—That is the first and foremost question.

2765. What chance under the existing system has the politician who lives in a town to alter the Revenue system?—I do not say that; I have never said that.

2766. Therefore, you do not suggest that the people who live in the towns would not help you with your Revenue, do you?—No; whatever I have said relates to up to the present time. I do not mean to say that they might not do so. What I mean to say is that up to the present they have not.

2767. I put it to you that that was because they could not?—In certain respects, excuse me, they could. For instance, take the question of opening the schools. No townspeople have so far opened any school for the benefit of agriculture, though many have been opened in towns. Then you have got very many witnesses here, but you will excuse me when I say that most emphasis was laid on industries and a good many other things, but did you hear much about the Land Revenue Policy and the agricultural classes?

2768. We were studying constitutional reforms?—I do not mean that. I am talking about what has been said to you here in this room. If the educated classes wished to help they could take up their cause in that way.

2769. Have you been present at most of the sittings of this Committee?—Not most of the sittings, but some.

2770. Have you not heard a very large demand that Land Revenue should be a transferred subject?—It may have been, but the question is whether they have put forward the demand for a change in the policy. May I ask, if it becomes a transferred subject, will the policy be changed? If it means that, it is quite right.

2771. Would you like it to be a transferred subject or a reserved subject?—I have just now expressed my meaning in this way, that if it is to be a transferred subject it ought to go to a man who belongs to that community and understand how they are faring.

2772. Which would you prefer it to be, or would you rather not express an opinion?—Personally, I would like it to be transferred and to go under that head.

2773. You know of the organisation called The Chief Khalsa Dewan?—Yes.

2774. You regard that as representative of your community?—I do.

2775. They presented an address to the Viceroy and myself; did you ever see that address?—Yes.

2776. Do you agree with it?—Yes, I do.

Lord Sinha.

2777. The line of discrimination between Sikhs and non-Sikhs is the matter of a huge controversy, is it not?—Yes.

2778. You would not suggest an official announcing only the religious belief of a proposed elector, would you?—Not at all; I rather propose quite a different thing. My suggestion is that as it is a religious question it should go to a religious body. But I do not refer to elector. My proposal refers to a candidate for Provincial Council when faith question is challenged by another candidate.

2779. I suppose you know that Lord Southborough's Committee in this matter was being advised and assisted by a co-opted colleague, the Honourable Sardar Sundar Singh, who is the Sikh representative on the Viceroy's Council?—Yes.

2780. And what they have laid down has been with his advice and assistance?—I do not know; he may have given his agreement; I cannot say that.

2781. You have read the Report?—Not the whole.

2782. The portion of it with regard to the Punjab?—Yes; but not the whole, in the way that this member gave this opinion and that member that opinion.

2783. I did not suggest that, but you have read the Report itself as a whole?—Yes.

2784. You know, do you not, the recommendations of the Lieutenant-Governor of the Local Government with regard to Sikh representation: do you remember what he recommended?—He recommended on the same lines.

2785. On the same lines as the Southborough Committee?—Yes.

2786. And the recommendation was: 6 Sikh members, out of a Council of 60, I think? That was the Lieutenant-Governonr's original proposal: do you remember that?—Yes; I do.

2787. Lord Southborough has made it 9 in a Council of 85; 8 Sikhs and 1 landholder Sikh; 9 altogether out of a total of 85?—Yes; but you remember at the same time it was 5 out of 40, as far as I remember, and the number of Sikhs was increased later on in nearly the same proportion as the total number of seats.

2788. That is what I say?—And was in the same proportion to the recommendation of the Local Government.

2789. I was just putting to you that the number has been increased further than the Lieutenant-Governor himself had recommended, so far as Sikhs are concerned?—Excuse me, what I meant to say was this, that 5 Sikhs were recommended, and the total number of seats was about 40, if I am not wrong, and not 60.

2790. It was 6 out of a Council of 60?—It was 60, and it came up to 83. I meant to say that that number was increased later on proportionately.

2791. That is what I am pointing out?—The number of Sikhs instead of being 5 was proportionately to go up.

2792. I point out to you that the proportion is larger?—In that way, as I have said, 9 Sikhs out of 83. At the same time, out of other seats connected with the University, and so on, many are sure to be captured by non-Sikhs 2793. They could be captured by Sikhs, too, I think?—No; so far as general elections are concerned, we are hopeful of nothing at all.

2794. If you are an average representative of your community I do not see why that should be so?—Excuse me, it does not depend on the community itself, because nowadays we are having our second-class brethren, the Sahjdhari Sikhs coming in. Now we may have a person belonging to another creed coming in, and he is entitled to vote, so that it does not depend on one class alone.

2795. What do you suggest that Lord Southborough, or his Committee rather, might have done which they did not do?—My suggestion is that it could increase the number of seats; for instance, the urban population should have been excluded from the rural constituency and given a separate seat.

2796. You cannot have communal representation as well as seats in the General Council, and you do not suggest that?—Excuse me, but you might have done just as you have done when you put the two classes together.

2797. Do you suggest that there should be communa seats and also seats in the general constituencies fo Sikhs?—I will not say that, but they might have been given an extra seat.

2798. You mean that the eight or nine might have been ten or twelve?—Yes.

2799. Upon what basis? Can you suggest a basis different from what Lord Southborough's Committee took. That is what I want to know?—As far as the seats were assigned, I do not think they were assigned on any basis—excuse me when I say so; but if it is to be on the basis that we get some extra seats on account of our political importance, one more could be added.

2800. How would you do it?—Just as two were added before.

2801. You mean arbitrarily?—Not in that way; you added two on account of what reasons?

2802. The Committee did not do it in that way; the Committee added to the Lieutenant-Governor's number, taking into account the increase in the total number; the Lieutenant-Governor having suggested six out of 60, the Committee made it nine out of 85?—Yes.

2803. So that they got a proportion on more or less the same, only it gave a little more than the Lieutenant-Governor

Governor recommended?—Excuse me, but do you mean to say that whatever the Lieutenant-Governor said is to be accepted?

2804. I do not suggest that for a moment?—If you mean that, I have no reply.

2805. I do not suggest that for a moment?—If you do not mean that, then I say you have a right to do something more in that way.

2806. That is to say, when the Lieutenant-Governor said that the Sikhs, by reason of their importance and their services, deserved more than their numbers required, you say he ought to have suggested a larger proportion?—Yes.

2807. The uncertain factor of the political importance and services, or, rather, the imponderable factor, you assess at a larger figure?—I do not say that; you say that I desire on an uncertain basis another seat could be added, and I say that you should act on the particular basis on which you think extra seats were given to us then.

2808. Practically, the one is as uncertain as the other?—That may be known to the officials who suggested it.

2809. I put it to you that your suggestion is that the one is as uncertain as the other?—I will not say that, I would not say uncertain.

2810. You stated that there was no one to take up the cause of the village community in the Punjab; is that so?—In a sense.

2811. Who do you think would be the proper and natural representative of the cultivated classes of the Punjab? Are they to go unrepresented?—No; what I mean to say is this, that you encourage them to take up their own cause—that is what I suggest.

2812. And there is no one to take it up?—Very few.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Duke of NORTHUMBERLAND.

Lord SYDENHAM.
Lord SINHA.
Mr. F. D. ACLAND.
Mr. BENNETT.
Mr. MONTAGU.
Major ORMSBY-GORE.
Sir J. D. REES.
Mr. SPOOR.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE EARL OF SELBORNE IN THE CHAIR.

RAI BAHADUR K. V. REDDI is called in; and Examined, as follows:—

Chairman.

2813. I think you come on behalf of the South Indian Liberal Federation?—Yes.

2814. Particularly to give evidence with respect to the views of the non-Brahmins of Madras?—Yes.

2815. And you have been good enough to furnish us with a list of answers to our questions?—Yes.

The same is handed in, and is as follows:—

1. Do you accept the proposition that it is desirable to bring about the progressive realisation of responsible Government in India? and, if so, how do you define the expression "responsible government"? And do you generally accept the proposition contained in the Preamble?—I accept the proposition that it is desirable to bring about the progressive realisation of "responsible government" in India. I would define responsible Government as that form of Government which is really democratic, and in which the executive is controlled by the decision of a legislative body which is elected, and which is reasonably, if fairly, representative of all sections of the people, having regard to their numbers, their property, their tax-paying capacity, and their ability to contribute to the wealth of the country and to its defence. That Government which is responsible to a legislative body composed mainly, if not wholly, of a particular section of the people, cannot be a responsible Government. The responsibility must be, though indirectly, to the people at large, and not to a section thereof, however intelligent, advanced, or politically minded that section may be. In short, it must be a democratic Government. I accept the proposition contained in the preamble, with addition of the word democratic between the words "self-governing" and "institutions."

2. Do you think that the realisation of responsible Government in the provinces involves the establishment in provincial legislatures of a substantial elected majority? (Clause 6)?—Yes.

3. Do you think that the non-official members of the provincial legislatures should possess power to control the actions and policy of the executive? Do you think they possess such power at present?—I think that the non-official members of the provincial legislatures should possess power to control the actions of the executive, provided the legislatures are so constituted as to represent all classes and communities in proportion to their numbers, their property, their tax-paying capacity, and their ability to contribute to the wealth of the country and to its defence. The legislatures do not possess such powers at present. Nor can we consent to any powers being given to these legislatures, unless they are constituted in the manner just described. Under the conditions at present prevailing in the Province of Madras, such legislatures cannot be constituted therein, unless provision is made for communal representation on the lines described in the memorandum herewith submitted.

4. Do you think that there are certain matters or functions of Government in the provinces in which at present the provincial executive must remain responsible to the Secretary of State and Parliament, and must therefore be in a position to enforce its wishes?—Yes.

5, 6. If you accept the propositions stated under questions 1 to 4, do you think that the dual form of government embodied in the Bill is the best means of securing them? If not, what are your objections to that feature of the Bill, and by what other means would you attempt to secure the objects in view? If you have any other method to suggest, does it (i.) provide possibilities of advance by stages and facilitate the "progressive realisation of responsible government," and, if it does, in what way? (Clauses 2, 3, etc.), and (ii.) does it afford means of judgment (a) to the electors and (b) to the Statutory Commission which is to examine and report on progress, of the success or failure in results of the control exercised by the legislature and those who represent it in the executive?—We do not think that the dual form of Government embodied in the Bill is the best means of securing the objects referred to in the previous answers. Our objections are:—(1) Friction between the Executive Council and the Ministry. (2) Possible unpopularity of ministers, as compared with Executive Councillors, in the matter of taxation. (3) Divided responsibility of executive is not good in principle. Unreal nature of a "united front" by the two parts. (4) Absence of scope for ministers to be trained in all branches of administration. (5) Minister's opinion and influence, and through him of the Legislative Council, will not be reflected in the administration of the reserved subjects. (6) Trouble regarding the public services and their position under ministers, in transferred subjects. (7) Budget troubles, including those indicated by the controversy regarding joint purse purse and separate purse. (8) The inherent impracticability of division of responsibility in certain subjects. (9) Unfairness of judging the working of the system of government by the efficiency of the minister, and not by the record of the legislative body, in the enquiry by the statutory commission. (10) Opposition of Local Governments to the dual system. Having objected to the dual form of government, I would attempt to secure the objects in view by a system of the kind described below. The Government will consist of the Governor and four Executive Councillors or four Ministers—I would prefer the latter appellation, being akin to the English system. To begin with, two of these ministers will be Britishers, and the other two will be Indians. The latter will be selected by the Governor from the elected members of the Legislative Council. There will be a division of subjects into transferred and reserved subjects. The Legislative Council—constituted on a thoroughly representative and communal basis—will have full control under the transferred subjects, which will ordinarily form the portfolios of the Indian Ministry, but there need be no rule to that effect. English ministers also can be in charge of these transferred subjects. There need be no distinction of any kind between the Indian element and British element in the ministry. It is to be a Unitary Government, which is responsible to the Legislature on transferred subjects, and to the Government of India and the Parliament on reserved subjects. Proposals of the Ministry for the appropriation of provincial revenues shall be submitted to the Legislature whose resolutions thereon are binding on the Ministry in all matters connected with transferred subjects, except in increasing expenditure, but not so on reserved subjects, in which case the Governor's certification prevails. In fact, all the provisions of the Bill appropriate for the above purposes will remain. The apportionment of expenditure between reserved and transferred subjects will have to be determined by a financial committee for a period of nine years. Some subjects will be transferred in the beginning, and at the end of nine years in the wake of proved fitness more subjects will follow. The Governor will have full powers as in the Bill to meet all exigencies. The Legislature will control legislation, but all the safeguards provided in the Bill will remain. It provides for a Unitary Government. None of the objections urged against Diarchy can be raised against this scheme. Such a scheme makes a beginning—and a substantial beginning—in responsible government. It provides possibilities of advance by stages, and facilitates the progressive realisation of responsible government. This system will afford means of judgment to the electors and to the Statutory Committee in the same manner and to the same extent as the system in the Bill is expected to afford. The only difference is that instead of judging by the acts or the efficiency of the Minister, they will have to judge by the acts and efficiency of the Legislative Council.

7. If you consider a dual form of government acceptable in principle, are there any points of detail the modification of which you regard as necessary? If so, what are those points, and what modifications would you suggest?—This question does not arise in view of the above answer.

8. In particular, do you think (i.) that Ministers should hold office "during pleasure"?—i.e., should be liable to removal if they are unable to support the action decided upon in their department by the Governor or if they fail to retain the confidence of the Legislature? (Clause 3 (1)). (ii.) That the Governor should have power to disregard the opinion of his Ministers if he considers that action in accordance with that opinion is inconsistent with the due discharge of his responsibilities? (Clause 3 (3)). (iii.) That the Executive Council should in all provinces normally consist of one official European and one non-official Indian? (Clause 4). (iv.) That the Governor should have power to dissolve his Legislative Council? (Clause 7 (4))?—(i.) Yes. This is contained in my answers to questions 5 and 6. (ii.) The Governor should have the power in the system above suggested. (iii.) Does not arise in view of the scheme. (iv.) Yes.

9. Referring back to questions 2, 3 and 4, if your answers to the first and third of these are in the affirmative, and if you think that the Legislatures should be given greater powers of control and influence than they possess at present, do you regard the limitations imposed generally by Clause 9 of the Bill upon their financial and legislative powers as (i.) suitable, or as (ii.) unnecessarily severe, or as (iii.) inadequate to safeguard the responsibilities which the Government owes in the last resort to Parliament (Clause 9)?—(i.) Applying the limitations to the above system they are suitable. (ii.) They are severe, but may remain for the present. (iii.) They are adequate to safeguard the responsibilities referred to.

10. In particular, (i.) do you think that the Legislature should have power with whatever limitations to vote supplies (Clause 9 (2))? (ii.) Do you accept the plan of Grand Committees as the means of giving to the Government the power to secure essential legislation in the event of their failure to carry their propositions in the Council? If so, have you any modifications of detail to suggest? If not, what other method would you suggest to secure the object in view?—(i.) Yes. (ii.) Yes; because I have no better plan to suggest, nor any modifications.

11. Do you accept the position adopted in the Bill (Part II.) that the time has not yet come to give the Legislative Assembly a similar measure of control over the Central Government as that given to provincial Legislative Councils over provincial governments?—Yes.

17. Do you agree that the gradual realisation of responsible government involves periodical examination of progress by independent authority, and that the provisions of Clause 28 of the Bill are well designed to afford such examination?—Yes. I would, however, substitute eight years for ten years in Clause 28. Three terms of a Legislative Council will cover nine years. If, at the end of eight years, the inquiry is begun the Commission will be able to report and necessary steps can be taken within the ninth year. So that if any changes are to be made they can be introduced at the end of the ninth year, and they can come into force with the new Councils of the fourth term. Ten years are too long, in my opinion.

18. Are there any matters which it is proposed in the Bill to deal with by rule which you would suggest should be provided for in the Bill?—Yes. The Brahmin-non-Brahmin question will have to be settled by making the necessary modifications in the Bill and in the Schedule. The Franchise Committee recommended that the question might be settled by the Government of India after the Bill was passed. Clause (6) proviso (a) of the Bill, read with Schedule (1) also seems to provide for such a course if the clause "for varying the proportions which the classes of members specified in that Schedule bear to one another" can be held to empower the India Government to provide seats for Brahmins and non-Brahmins separately in the Madras Legislative Council. The India Government themselves are against such a proposal. They say, "We have grave practical objections to this suggestion. If the reform scheme is not to start under a heavy handicap in Madras the bitter feelings which have been aroused by this controversy must be allayed. We cannot expect co-operation and goodwill from the non-Brahmins so long as no provision is made to secure their interests. . . . Our own responsibility for the contentment of the country makes it incumbent upon us to make every attempt to arrive at a settlement which will satisfy the reasonable claims of both parties before reforms are introduced. It is indeed not only the two contesting parties who are interested." As pointed out in the Memorandum herewith submitted, such a colossal measure as the present reform scheme with far-reaching consequences cannot be ushered in when vast majorities are groaning at the very threshold. The feeling of the non-Brahmins at the present movement has been sufficiently described in tthe Memorandum. Great disappointment and discontent would prevail if no provision is made in the Bill. It is impossible to predict what the consequences will he. We have pointed out in the Memorandum, in another connection, that the Government of India did not show any sympathy to the non-Brahmins till recently, and in the fifth Report they have committed themselves to reservation of seats in plural constituencies. We have always been demanding separate electorates, and it is not fair to us to be referred back to the Government of India. We also respectfully beg to state that we do not expect sufficient sympathy from the present Madras Government. We propose that the figure 61 in column 3 of Schedule I., noted against Madras under the heading "General Electorates," be altered into 49, and in the next column 18 be altered into 30. We also propose that in proviso (a) to Clause 6 (1) the clause "for varying the proportions which the classes of members specified in that Schedule bear to one another be omitted." We also suggest that a clause be introduced in the Bill itself to disqualify those that came in Communal electorates to take part in general electorates. We also suggest that paragraph (2) of Section 23 of the Bill should be so altered as to make it incumbent on His Majesty's Government to move the passing of the rules and obtain the consent of both Houses of Parliament.

19. Have you any observations to offer on the Reports of Lord Southborough's Committees and of the Committee on the Home Administration of Indian Affairs?—Our observations on the Report of the Franchise Committee, so far as they concern—the, to us, all important question of—Communal representation are contained in the Memorandum herewith submitted, and that Memorandum may be treated as an answer to question 19. In addition, we beg leave to add that the rural franchise, as given in the Franchise Report, is not broad enough. The number of rural voters is very small when compared with urban voters. Their number must be sufficiently raised by lowering the property qalification. The percentage given by the Franchise Committee at the end of page 26 of the Report is somewhat misleading. Soldiers and men of the Labour Corps shall be given the right to vote, as also wage earners. We also insist upon residential qualification for candidates. The provision of seats for landholders other than Zanindas is obviously inadequate. They must be given at least six seats. On the question of transferred subjects, our position is that no subjects shall be transferred if Communal representation is not to be granted for non-Brahmins. If Communal representation is granted we accept the division proposed by the Committee on division of functions, except as regards secondary and university education, which, in our opinion, should not be transferred until at least the first commission of inquiry sits and reports. My association had no opportunity of considering the Report of Lord Crewe's Committee. Personally speaking, I accept the recommendations therein.

2816. And also a Memorandum?—Yes. (See Appendix H.)

2817. It is a very full Memorandum, for which we are much obliged. Have you anything you wish to say supplementary to it?—Yes.

2818. In as brief a manner as you can, please?—At the very outset I come under certain disadvantages which are mostly known to your Lordship and your Lordship's Committee. The great man who led our party has been called away, and those that are left behind cannot expect to put their case with the clearness, ability and force with which he would certainly have placed our case before your Lordship and your Lordship's Committee. Being under that disadvantage and disability I have to crave your Lordship's indulgence and the indulgence of your Lordship's Committee to permit me to speak, not with the briefness which is expected of me, but with a little indulgence, which the greatness of the cause which I come to represent demands. With that preliminary remark I will introduce myself. As I said, I was only a camp follower, and I came here as a lieutenant of our great leader I am 45 years old, and I belong to what is known in my country as the Kapu caste. That caste represents the agricultural peasants and the agricultural labourers mainly. There are some rich men who own land, but they are very few. I personally belong to that community. I graduated some 25 years ago, in the year 1894, and took my degree of lawyer in 1900. Previous to that I was a professor in a Government College, and also a teacher in science. At present I hold the place of the elected non-official President of the Taluk Board of Ellore, which has more than two lakhs of people within its jurisdiction, four-hundred villages and nearly 1,600 or 1,700 square miles. Certain questions arose before your Lordship's Committee regarding Local self-government and certain statements were made by other witnesses which I am perfectly willing to give answers upon. I have also been a Municipal Councillor for the last 16 years; I have been a member of the Polavaram and Ellore Taluk Boards for about 12 years and a member of the Godaveri and Kistna District Boards for about eleven years, and I have served as a member on the following official and quasi-official committees:—The Franchise Conference presided over by Lord Pentland in 1918; the Elementary Education Conference presided over by His Excellency Lord Pentland in 1918; the Madras Recruiting Board; the Madras Soldiers' Board, of which I am still a member; the Committee to consider the revision and amendment of the Madras Local Boards Act; and I also served on the Committee to revise the Madras Districts Municipal Account Code and the Local Fund Code, the Kistna District Recruiting Board, the Kistna District Soldiers' Board, the Kistna District Forest Committee, the Kistna District War Loan Committee, the Kistna District Emergency Board, the Kistna District Police Committee, and the Ellore Abkari Committee. I have attended some Congress Sessions and several Povincial and District Conferences. I presided over the Chittore District Non-Brahmin Conference in 1918; I presided over the 4th Kistna District Ryot's Conference. I attach some importance to that. I was chairman of the Reception Committee of the six coasts districts (northern Circars) Non Brahmin Conference, held in November, 1917. I presided over the Nellore District Conference in 1916. I am a member of the South Indian Liberal Federation, and of its Executive body, the South Indian People's Association, and I claim to represent nearly 28 millions of people out of a population of 41 millions. Having introduced myself, I should like to place before your Lordships' Committee the position of my Association with regard to these reforms. Some misrepresentations were made, and we were not properly represented to the authorities both in England and India as regards our position. It was stated that we were opposed to the reforms, and because the Madras Government also was opposed to the reforms we were in league with them. It was even alleged that the Madras Government was backing us up negatively, and some suggestions were thrown out that there was something behind our movement. I respectfully beg to submit that all these charges are most unfounded and ungenerous. There is a motive for these ungenerous charges against us. They want to cloud the real issue before us, the one issue for which the non-Brahmin Association stands, and which it has deputed me to plead, the one issue of communal representation with communal electorates. In order to make that clear I will at once state my case. Put in a single sentence, I say any reform short of Home Rule (and that need not interfere with us because it does not arise) with communal representation and communal electorates we are prepared to accept, and we are not prepared to accept any reforms without communal representation. That is our attitude. No doubt your Lordship will be pleased to see that in answering questions 5 and 6 we put forward a scheme which in some respects differs from the scheme in the Bill and in the Joint Report. But even that issue I would not like to cloud. The real issue in the case so far as we are concerned, and if it comes to a question of accepting one or the other, if communal representation is granted I would respectfully submit that my Association and the non-Brahmins in Madras would be perfectly willing to accept any reforms which this Committee may recommend to the Houses of Parliament and the Houses of Parliament may pass.

The reason why so much misrepresentation has been made I may at once make clear. The question arises

Chairman—continued.

in this way. In the year 1916 Mr. Churchill—I should perhaps call him Colonel Churchill—made a speech in the House of Commons which was not telegraphed to us by Reuter—it came later on, about July that year. Addressing the Government, Colonel Churchill said we could raise about ten or twelve Divisions in India. Of all the people in the Madras Presidency—it was myself and my friends who set ourselves to work both on the platform and in the Press, and even approaching the Government authorities to permit us to raise two or three Divisions in the Madras Presidency. We were at once met with an outburst of opposition from the Brahmins of the Presidency, who said that we should support the Government and should support British Armies only if the Government promised Home Rule to India. It may be a perfectly loyal decision, but still it was a position with which we could not agree. We said, Home Rule or no Home Rule, we must set aside everything at that period of the Empire; we must set aside every other consideration and see that the armies were raised in India. By that very time, in 1916, Mrs. Besant's Home Rule Leagues were at work. To us Home Rule only meant Brahmin rule, and we did not want to part with British association and the benefits we have received. We believe, and others also believe, that we owe the present contentment, the present peace, the present happiness purely to our British association. Providence in its mercy placed us under Great Britain, and that intellectual servitude, that social slavery, and that political bondage in which we had been placed before the advent of the British had been removed, and though after the British advent we had not been able to occupy the position which is rightly ours, by our numbers, by the great taxes we pay for the upkeep of the whole Province, and by the vast interests which my community holds in the country, yet we are indebted to Great Britain so much that we could not expect that we could have similar benefits from the Brahmins, freedom or no freedom, to use their language. After all, freedom, however great our conception, is only intended to give happiness, to raise the standard of life, to see that happiness is increased, and all reforms, whatever be their aim, must have as their first element this happiness of mankind and this raising of the standard of life. These two ingredients of reforms we think we cannot have if a system is introduced—a system in which only a particular community in the country is to rise to power and the rest are left behind. That was our view, and we naturally thought that this Home Rule meant Brahmin rule. Non-Brahmin leaders were perturbed, and thought that something must be done to stop this flowing tide of Home Rule started by Mrs. Besant and taken up by the Brahmins. It was in those circumstances that, in November, 1916, a few days before the Congress met at Lucknow, we had to form our Association. It has been stated that our Association came into existence after the Montagu-Chelmsford Report. That is not correct. In the first place the non-Brahmin movement in a certain stage was there. As somebody said, it is as old as the days of Manu. It was in those earlier days that these disabilities commenced. Conquest after conquest followed, and in those days perhaps we had to protect ourselves against foreigners; but when peace and contentment rested in the country the same old disabilities continued, and the restrictions and rigour of caste continued, and, in fact, have been quite recently enhanced, by a school of thought which has sprung up in the country, mostly created, or at least fostered, by the activities of Mrs. Besant and the Theosophists. There was a time, about twenty or thirty years ago, when the Indian social reformers were thinking of a reform of the society of Madras. Then came the wave of Theosophy, which said that everything ancient in India was good. If a woman swept a floor with cow-dung, a scientific explanation was found which scientists could not find, and the pride of the highest castes has been so tickled that they have come back to their old ways, and the rigour of caste has become tightened day after day. That is the social condition as to which I shall presently place before your Lordship one or two pictures—a picture of non-Brahmins and a picture of Panchamas. Perhaps I had better begin with the latter. Those Panchamas, as will be seen, number about six millions to seven millions in our Province, out of a total population of 41 millions. Those six millions do not live in the villages proper. Their hamlets are known as Mala hamlets, and "Mala" sounds exactly like "Mal" in "malpractice," or something of that kind, and it has even been explained that Mala magnetism should not approach Hindoos, because they will be polluted with it, and that they should be kept apart, and they are kept apart sometimes even miles and sometimes furlongs from the main village. When they go to purchase the slightest thing they have to go into the village, because no caste man has his shop in the hamlets, and half a day is lost if a person has to go to the market to purchase things. As President of the Taluk Board I am compelled under the rules to tour something like sixty days in the year. I have been President of the Taluk Board, which corresponds nearly to the presidentship of your County Council. I hope I shall be able to learn something about self-government here, but it nearly corresponds to that. As President of this Taluk Board I go about the villages and see for myself what is happening there.

I was submitting that this hamlet is about half a mile or three or four furlongs from the main village. As we approach the village, and, in fact, till I reach the hamlet the schoolmaster, perhaps my sanitary inspector, and two or three Brahmins—respectable men of the place—accompany me. But as soon as we reach the nearest house they clear out. They will not enter into the hamlet. I have to go alone, and even my own teacher, a Brahmin teacher whose promotion rests with the opinion he creates on me, cuts off, and I dare not ask him to follow me into the hamlet.

Then the insanitary condition of these hamlets is something indescribable. The dignity of the Committee does not permit me to describe it in words. As we enter we find a small hut in which are huddled six or seven persons, five or six of them children, almost naked, and the man and the wife, your Lordships will be sorry to learn, are clad in something which cannot be called clothes, but rags. What they eat I have not seen, but one thing I know, when they want to go away they will say "I will go and drink my rice water." He will not say he will eat a meal, because he has none. The matter does not stop there. They are not admitted into hospitals. If a Brahmin happens to be the surgeon he will have to stand outside the hospital, and the compounder asks him what is the matter with him. His pulse is not felt, the thermometer is not applied, and the stethoscope is not applied, but something is prescribed, and he has to take it home and drink it in his place. No wonder that when cholera breaks out it is these parts mostly that are affected. I have not the figures here, but I am sure that the mortality in these classes is certainly higher than in the villages close by. There is another circumstance I must place before your Lordship. The water supply of these Panchama hamlets is bad to think of. During my tour as President of the Taluk Board I had occasion to see one clear instance which I think I should place before your Lordships' Committee. I generally halt at a big place in the morning and go to the neighbouring villages and come back to my headquarters. One day, about five o'clock in the morning, I left the village, and was going to a distant village four or five miles off. I found about twenty or thirty Mala women waiting to get their water, waiting for some man of caste to draw it out of the well, because they cannot touch the well, they cannot put their bucket into the well. I thought it was a matter of course. I went on my journey—it was a case of encroachment which we considered more important than all these things. I finished my business, and was returning in my palanquin with six or eight bearers, and at the same spot on my return journey, when it was ten o'clock (and your Lordships' Committee can understand what it is at ten o'clock in the month of May in India—it will be something like 114 deg. or 118 deg. in the sun) in that sun I found seventy or eighty women and children waiting with their pots in hand unable to touch the well, and without a man or woman in the caste to draw the water. Nothing could have been more heartrending than that. I would submit respectfully that though these Taluk

Board and District Boards have been doing their best—it was represented to their Lordships' Committee that they have not progressed, but I do not agree—I will be able to show in what directions the Government have been able to make great advances in these Taluk Boards, but still the condition is there. It is not merely political, it is not merely a thing which the Government alone can remove, but it is ingrained in the social circumstances of the country, a thing which can be eradicated only after a great advance is made, and that can be made only when equality is recognised both in social, religious and political matters. There is no admission for the Panchama into the public schools, and I, as President of the Taluk Board, have enormous difficulties in obtaining Panchama schools for Panchamas alone. I am managing something like 120 schools, board elementary schools, and there are 300 teachers. About 220 or 230 of these are Brahmin teachers. Not one single Brahmin teacher would like to go and teach in these Panchama schools, though I promise them a promotion which they would not otherwise deserve. They would not accept it. I have got a list of all my schools, and all these Panchama schools had to be manned either by a Panchama or by a Christian, or by a Mohammedan or by a non-Brahmin. No Brahmin teacher would like to teach those boys. That is the picture that I would place before your Lordships' Committee to consider what part the system of caste plays in Madras, and in this connection I would beg your Lordships' Committee to distinguish the case of Madras from the other Provinces. I have travelled in the north. I was at Calcutta, I was at Benares, I was at Delhi, I was at Agra, I was at Bombay, I was at Nagpur. I have seen all northern India, but nothing which obtains in Madras is to be seen in all its rigour and exclusiveness, which is peculiarly Madrassee. I would therefore earnestly submit to your Lordships' Committee that the Caste of Madras might be dealt with as purely a separate entity in itself.

I forgot to give a picture of the Indian peasant. I thought some question was put—I thought it was Lord Sinha who put the question. I tried to meet it in my memorandum. There are two paragraphs concerning the Indian peasant and the influence that is brought to bear upon him if he tries to exercise his vote. In that there is a quotation from the Joint Report itself, so that I believe my task is a bit lightened there. Still, I am here for any cross-examination on that point.

2819. I think you may take it that we understand your point of view in respect of the non-Brahmins and the Brahmins in the Madras Presidency. What we would like to hear from you, if you have anything further to say which is not in your memorandum, is how you ask us to remedy that?—My Lord, I was presently coming to that. I will draw your Lordship's attention to the resolutions of our association and show how we are ourselves trying to get some reforms—not extreme reforms, but moderate reforms—which will suit the condition of the country. That is our position. I was referring to the charges made against us, that there was something behind our movement and that the Madras Government has been supporting us. The Madras Government, in its various reports to the Government of India, showed that they were not in favour of the reforms, and in order to link us with the Madras Government, to show that we are hand in glove with them, the same thing is attributed to us, and it was said that we are also not in favour of reforms. That is an absolute myth.

2820. You have told us that already?—I am going to bring to your Lordship's notice a resolution in that connection. As if by providence, on the very day on which the famous declaration was pronounced in the House of Commons, a conference of non-Brahmins met at Coimbatore and passed a resolution which would sound very like the scheme in the Report. That resolution runs in these words: "The departments of local self-government, education, sanitation, agriculture, co-operation, and industries to be placed under the control of non-official members of the Legislative Council, the administrative control of these departments being vested in Indian hands, with a view to their being placed under the executive control of the non-official members in the near future." This was on the 20th August, 1917, when we did not know the views of the Government of India or the Right Hon. the Secretary of State for India. When we came to know of the famous declaration we met in conference, and the second Resolution runs thus:—"The Conference thanks the Right Honourable Mr. Montagu, Secretary of State for India, and the British Cabinet, for the announcement made that the policy of His Majesty's Government is that of increasing association of Indians with every branch of the Administration, and a steady development of self-governing institutions with a view to the progressive realisation of responsible government in India as an integral part of the British Empire, and as a first step in that direction the following scheme of reforms is strongly recommended for the acceptance of the Government." I will not trouble your Lordships' Committee with all the Resolutions, but one sentence is this: "In view of the fact that power and caste are at present chiefly centred in a single community, and that other communities have only a slender chance of securing due representation in the Councils unless proper safeguards are provided, and in view also of the fact that in the near future the powers of the Council are expected to be enhanced, this Conference declares that any scheme of reform either of the Councils of the country or of the public services in which due and adequate representation is not provided for, the larger non-Brahmin communities of this Province on the basis above mentioned is bound to result in failure and consequent discontent and disharmony, and this Conference strongly recommends the provision of a scheme of reforms on the following lines." Then is given a scheme in which communal representation is a fundamental basis.

2821. What we want more than anything else is your exact proposal for communal representation?—I will at once come to that. I have mentioned it in the Memorandum. We want not what is proposed by the Government of India, that is a reservation of certain seats, 30 seats out of 61 in a general electorate, or a plural electorate, as it is called, but we want that a separate electorate may be given to us in which the Brahmins should not take part. That is our desire. I may be permitted to draw your Lordship's attention to the paragraphs in that connection. They begin at paragraph 39.

2822. Do you wish to add anything to that?—We want separate electorates, and our reasons are those given in this Memorandum. We submit that these general electorates as proposed by the Government and hinted at in the Report of Lord Southborough are not communal representation. It may be anything else. It does not facilitate the election of persons who can be said to be truly representative of the non-Brahmin communities. It will be noticed that communal representation is given to the Indian Christians, Anglo-Indians and Europeans, and the only community which we always dreaded is not separated from us. I pointed out in another place that we would be perfectly willing to have a general electorate with Indian Christians, because most of the Indian Christians are non-Brahmins in the sense that they were converted from our communities mostly—of course, there are a few Brahmins who could be counted on one's fingers—even Mohammedans and Europeans and Anglo-Indians we have no objection to if a general electorate is wanted. Our complaint is that we cannot get on if we are linked with the Brahmins. We can never succeed against them—they are so powerful.

One or two charges have been made, and I think I may be given an opportunity to meet them. It has been said—I think Mrs. Besant said that ours is an anti-Brahmin movement. I respectfully beg to submit that we are not at all anti-Brahmin in the sense in which she meant it. If claiming one's own rights, claiming his own place in the government of the country is to be said to be anti or hostile to any others; certainly the whole constitution that is being given to us can be construed in that way, because we find Indians, almost every Indian, coming and submitting that we want our Legislative Councils to be filled with Indians in the place of European official members there. Are they anti-British when they are demanding it? When Mohammedans claim separate representation from Hindoos are they anti-Hindoo? Similarly our opposition is not one of anti-Brahmin at all but is trying to get our legitimate place in the councils councils of the country. That legitimate place will be understood when your Lordships' Committee look at the facts of the case which are to be found in this book. I do not wish to trouble your Lordships with it, but this fact remains that we are 79 per cent. or nearly 80 per cent. of the population, and more if the Panchamas are included, as they are included, in our constituency. In fact, I am going to plead that the three seats allowed to them are not sufficient, and they must be given at least six seats. We form the largest part of the population, we pay the entire taxes.

I brought to your Lordship's notice in the Memorandum that the Brahmins do not pay any appreciable tax at all. They own lands, but almost all are tax free. They managed to get freedom in the old days, and that continues, and the British Government never interfered. They do not even pay the water assessment.

2823. I think we have got enough about your case, but you may wish to say something at the end?—I wish to answer one or two charges which have been levelled against my party. In the course of the evidence it has been said that there was something at the bottom of our movement. I do not think I have sufficiently met that statement. Of course, in general terms I deny it, but I could prove to the satisfaction of your Lordships' Committee that those charges are thoroughly unfounded.

Lord Sydenham.

2824. This Committee has been told that the difficulties arising from caste are passing away. Is that your opinion?—Certainly not. On the contrary, they are increasing now.

2825. Is it your opinion that caste is tending to become more rigorous in Southern India than before?—I should think so; just as power is being given it will be employed for the purpose of concentrating that power more and more to the detriment of the other communities, with the result that the gulf between them will be widened unless equality is established by communal representation or some such device.

2826. The Varnashrama Dharma movement is designed to stereotype caste, is it not?—Yes.

2828. You have read Sir Alexander Cardew's Minute. Do you agree with it?—Entirely, except the reference where is means to block the reforms altogether.

2829. Your main contention is that in Madras, Brahmins wield most of the power?—They do.

2830. In education?—Yes.

2831. Is not education largely in the hands of the Brahmins?—Yes.

2832. Do you believe that under the Bill as it stands this dominance will continue?—It will enhance.

2833. You think it will not only continue, but be greater than before?—Yes.

2834. And you consider this domination of Brahmins in the past has been detrimental to the progress of non-Brahmins?—Yes.

2835. You have given a large number of instances, which mainly relate to educational matters?—Yes.

2836. There are colleges which were founded by non-Brahmins which now exclude Panchamas altogether?—Yes.

2837. Another charitable institution, also provided from non-Brahmin funds, is to be devoted to a school open to Brahmins alone?—Yes.

2838. Can you give us other illustrations of what you call oppression, apart from educational matters—in the matter of the use of the roads in Southern India?—That is with reference only to the Panchamas.

2839. I am speaking of Panchamas now?—They are not allowed to walk in certain streets in the villages. In the Amalapur Taluk there is a village called Perur, which is entirely filled with Brahmins. Panchamas are not allowed to pass through certain streets therein.

2840. Is that permitted under our laws?—It is contrary to the law. British law would never make such distinctions, I hope.

2841. Are appeals made to the Law Courts against this practice?—No. Some were made on the East Coast, but, so far as my portion of the country is concerned, it is like a man who lives in a dark chamber; he wishes to get back to his dark chamber; they take it as if it is their fate. Such a philosophy has been given to us that we are contented with anything, and these poor Panchamas think it was their fate to be born as Panchamas, and therefore they must bear it. They do not complain much.

2842. And they bear what you call this oppression without complaining, mostly because it is the custom of the past?—Yes.

2843. You have said that tyranny and oppression will fall on the non-Brahmins if they are not protected by communal representation?—Yes.

2844. Do you regard communal representation as the only effective protection which can be given to the non-Brahmins and to the depressed classes?—That is the only device I can think of.

2845. Did you read Sir Sankaran Nair's dissentient note?—I did.

2846. Do you accept his statement as to the work of the Home Rule League?—Certainly not.

2847. Do you consider that League has helped the cause of the non-Brahmins and the depressed classes in the past?—Not at all. The Home Rule League and the Brahmin Associations are hand and glove—they work together.

2848. In your original evidence, in your written memorandum, you say that the Brahmin Associations consented to communal representation?—Yes.

2849. The evidence which we have had does not seem to bear out that view. Can you explain the difference?—I cannot, except on the basis that those gentlemen who at that time agreed thought they could get our consent to something, and now that stage is over they thought they could get behind their words. I have here an address which I presented in 1907.

2850. You could put that in. There is no time to go into it now. Your view generally is that some of these people have changed their opinions?—I believe so. If that is opposed here it must be that.

2851. I understand that your movement is not an anti-Brahmin movement?—Certainly not.

2852. It is not inspired by any hatred of Brahmins?—No, certainly not.

2853. Your sole object is to secure reasonable protection for non-Brahmins in the future?—Yes.

2854. You say that out of 61 seats the non-Brahmins, under the operation of the present proposed Franchise as it now stands only secure 1?—I am wrong if I said that. It must be a misprint.

2855. You say "If the theory that because non-Brahmin voters are in vast majority therefore the non-Brahmins are sure to secure most of the seats be correct, then the Brahmins can only secure one seat"?—Yes, they could only secure one seat on that basis.

2856. Have you seen the proposals of the Government of India that 30 seats out of 61 should be reserved?—Yes.

2857. Do you approve of that proposal?—No.

2858. You do not think it is sufficient?—Not at all. I may be permitted to say a few words there. Thirty seats are reserved for non-Brahmins, and 31 seats for general electorates. In those 31 electorates, taking the proportion we had hitherto of 9 to 1 in 10 seats, nine-tenths of those seats will go to Brahmins—nine-tenths out of 30. That will be 27 seats, and of the remaining seats, those reserved for non-Brahmins, they will be filled up by what I described in my Memorandum as pro-Brahmin, non-Brahmins of the Madras Presidency Association. It is not our desire that they should not come in at all, but our only desire is they should come in as our representatives, and not through the help of the Brahmins, to whom they will be obliged, if they come in that way, and they will not be able to perform their duties towards their own community.

2859. Are the pro-Brahmins non-Brahmins to a large extent lawyers?—Well, there are very few non-Brahmin lawyers on either side. They are assisted by Brahmin lawyers.

2860. In the local government and municipal elections are they badly off, or do they do better?—They do a little better recently, for the reason that the ambition of the Brahmins has risen higher, and they do not care for seats on the local boards and municipalities except as a stepping stone for higher conditions.

2861. Therefore they are dropping out and the non-Brahmin is tending to get more into the local bodies?—Slightly.

2862. If communal representation is not granted to the non-Brahmins of Madras, what would be their attitude?—That is rather a difficult question to answer, but I shall attempt it. One thing open to us is to keep quiet and die a civil death. The second is that which is pointed to us as an example up in the north, what is known as the Satiagrara movement, or what would be called here direct action. That would certainly not recommend itself to the non-Brahmins who have been brought up, trained, and educated in a truly loyal spirit. There is, however, a third one which is likely to occur to some of us, and the nearest parallel in English history is that of the place occupied by the Fourth Party here under Lord Randolph Churchill in the early days of the Gladstonian Ministry. It is to oppose and obstruct the Government in all possible constitutional ways as far as the law will permit, and as far as the ability and the capacity and organisation of the few that get into the Council can do.

2863. On the whole, you think that third course is not likely to be followed?—It is too early to speak of that.

2864. You would endeavour to work the new constitution as far as you could; at all events to see how it would work?—If communal representation is given to us we are willing to co-operate with all our heart most loyally in any scheme given to us.

2865. The non-Brahmins of Southern India do not threaten this Committee and the Parliament of this country?—No, that has not been our way. If only our literature is examined it will be found how humble and how loyal we are. A non-Brahmin cannot afford to threaten.

Mr. Spoor.

2866. I have your Memorandum this morning. I have not had a chance of reading it carefully, but there are one or two points which it raises of some interest. First of all, I understand that the non-Brahmins of Madras refused to appear before Lord Southborough's Committee?—We did.

2867. So that your case was never stated at all in India?—That is so.

2868. You know that argument that they adopt with regard to your claim for separate representation, I mean that according to your own showing, you will have an overwhelmingly strong electorate, and as time passes if the franchise is widened, as we expect it will be widened, will it not be possible to correct the difficulties that you have mentioned?—Not so. With great respect I wish to place my case on that point here. I have given a picture of the Indian peasant who will have a right to vote here. This Indian peasant has got his own weaknesses. He will perhaps take water without letting the Government know, without application, or perhaps making a little encroachment on land, or there are some other difficulties, and on account of these he will be always entirely under the thumb of the Revenue officials. Often he has got litigation, and the lawyers are Brahmins. He does not understand the value of the vote, because he thinks that if he could get excused four or five rupees assessment that is more valuable than giving his vote to a person who can be expected to represent him in the councils of his country. If in the beginning some protection is not made nothing will be done by those interested. Mere numbers do not count. It would appear from the Government of India's statement that numbers do not count, taking into account the religious, educational and official influence of Brahmins. That is made clear by the Government of India's statement.

2869. My point is that with the passage of time, as education becomes spread in India, will not those difficulties disappear?—I fear not.

2870. We have had similar ones in England?—You have not got caste hatred, for instance. There is the Brahmin there. If he gets into power he will try to consolidate day after day, and the gulf between the Brahmin and the non-Brahmin will be widened, and we are going down deeper and deeper, and they are going higher and higher. That could not occur here. You have not got Brahmins in England, thank God!

2871. You gave your argument against practically the whole weight of the Indian evidence we have had so far?—But you have not had any non-Brahmin evidence yet. That will be all the other way.

Mr. Montagu.

2872. Did you say we had not had non-Brahmin witnesses?—I mean from Madras. We have to distinguish that case from the others.

Mr. Spoor.

2873. You suggest in the first paragraph of your Memorandum that the Home Rule movement is closely associated with the new social and reactionary movement?—Yes.

2874. Do you really suggest that the object of the Home Rule movement in India is to establish the caste system more firmly than ever?—Not that; but the Varnashramadharma movement.

2875. But you suggest a very intimate association between the two?—The office bearers and those organising it are the same.

2876. You seem to imply that there was a certain ulterior motive behind their work. You have associated it already in your memorandum with the Home Rule movement. It hardly squares with the statement which they have made to this Committee?—I draw a distinction between the Home Rule movement and the other movement. It is the latter which does it. It will be difficult for them to dissociate themselves the one from the other 2877. Further on in your memorandum you make a statement which you have borne out also in your statement this morning, as to the extraordinary amount of Brahmin influence and control in the Legislative Councils. You quote figures here?—Yes.

2878. You state earlier that the Brahmins, as a class, are clever and well educated, while the non-Brahmins are almost entirely illiterate. Is not that really the explanation of the whole position?—That may be an explanation, but it is not a satisfactory position.

2879. It may not be a satisfactory position?—It has been put elsewhere in India. I may be permitted to answer it in another way. It is this way. What is wanted in the Legislative Council is not the intellect of the country, but the interests of the country—that is, they will have to have their representatives who can protect their interests when any question comes. The place of the intellectuals is perhaps the lecture-room or the laboratory, or some other place. I do not mean to say that highly educated people should not be here, but all of them need not be. People who have a stake in the country, who have something to lose by what is happening in the Legislative Assembly, must be there to protect their own interests. That is my position, and for that it is certainly not necessary that one should be a highly educated man or a very highly cultured man. If I may be permitted to refer to Sydney Low's book on the Governance of England, there is a chapter headed the amateur Government, and the Government of this country was said to be filled with more or less amateurs. It was a criticism against this country by an American, and Sydney Low meets it by saying he who drives fat cattle need not himself be fat.

2880. My point is that the increase of political power which will come in the course of time, if the rural voters increase as you ask here—you ask for an extended rural franchise—will not that, together with the diffusion of education and the improved educational method which we hope will take place in India, solve the whole thing?—No; these things are interdependent upon one another. For instance, a man would educate his children only if he finds some relation is in the Service by virtue of his education. Where everyone round him is not educated there is not that emulation for him to send his children to be educated. Unless he sees his own men in the Legislative Councils, and unless he finds that was the result of the education they have been receiving, he will not be tempted to send his own children to be educated. These things act and inter-act. The only way you can bring about that that result is to have something to show to the ryots of the villages that so much is being enjoyed by other persons, who are their own relations, because they are educated. It is necessary to give that example to these villagers, and then they will be able to understand the value of education and of politics and of public service. Until then it will be the other way.

2881. Have you any specific suggestion to make as to how the rural worker can be best enfranchised?—The wage earners in whom you are interested are not represented here. I do not think I have stated it in my Memorandum. I would like to give votes to wage earners earning 20 rupees or 30 rupees a month. I would also give votes to soldiers that are demobilised. There are nearly 40,000 people, and even the Labour Corps I would give the vote to. As regards the urban and rural votes I would make a distinction. There is an unfortunate mistake in the Southborough Report. I think I had better bring it to your Lordships' notice. At Page 26, at the bottom, you will find the proportion of the urban electorate is stated. That is incorrect. The urban electorate would be something like 15 to 16 per cent. and the rural electorate will be only 1.5 or so. What they call the urban electorate is given on pages 24 and 25; non-Mohammedan urban seats 9, Mohammedan urban seats 2. 390,000 and 44,000 are added together, and the votes that are given to them are added to the other, and a percentage of 7.4 is arrived at. Lower down we have non-Mohammedan rural seats 52, with a population of 17,237,000 and voters 481,000. Those are taken as rural voters, but they are not really rural voters; at least half of them are urban voters. There are 72 Municipalities in the Presidency. Of these only five are taken out and separate seats given to them, and the voters therein are described as urban voters. As regards the remaining 67 Municipalities, the voters must be called urban voters because their voting qualification is the same as that of the cities mentioned here. If worked out in that way, I have the figures which the Madras Government supplied us in the Franchise Conference, and they would show that the urban votes and the rural votes are about the same, and the proportion would come to about 15 per cent. urban and 1 per cent. in the rural votes. That is an obvious injustice to the rural areas. I pointed out that the rural areas pay the entire taxes which go as a contribution to the maintenance of the Government. The expenditure of the Madras Presidency is about 7 or 8 crores, the whole of which is covered by land tax alone, if you include the water assessment. In municipalities the people do not pay a tax to the Central Government; they pay municipal rates, which go for local self-government. They do not go, except the Income Tax, to the Central Government.

2882. Assuming that the Committee decided to widen the Franchise so as to include more rural voters, do you think that the practical difficulty of polling such a large electorate and such a vast constituency can be overcome. It has been suggested that it would be an extremely difficult thing to do?—One trouble is the enormous cost which may be involved. Let it be understood that I am entirely in favour of increasing the voters' list. In answering this question, I do not want to be understood as being against increasing the Franchise.

2883. You ask for an increase?—Yes, I do. So if I am not understood in that light I will answer the question in this way. There are practical difficulties. For instance, the cost involved will be something enormous. I do not think most of my countrymen realise that the cost will have to be borne by the ryot. The second difficulty is to find men for these polling offices. As a municipal councillor, and as President of the Taluk Board, I have had sufficient experience of elections in very small bodies. There will be enormous difficulty in the way, because one candidate will say "he is a Brahmin and I do not want him," and another will say, "he is a non-Brahmin and I do not want him," or another man will say he is interested in a man and therefore he will not do for a polling officer or an identifying officer. When all these controversies are going on it is difficult to find independent men, because it will not do to have only half-a-dozen polling booths for a city. In my own constituency there will be 55,000 voters, and to find polling booths for them on one single day will be an enormous difficulty. But I do not wish that these difficulties should in any way come in the way of increasing the electorate. I mention them for the information of the Committee.

Sir J. D. Rees.

2884. You are a Telugu gentleman of the Kapu caste?—Yes.

2885. Do you observe the customs and obligations of that caste?—Well, just now perhaps——

2886. In India?—In India we do.

2887. No, I mean you personally?—I do, generally speaking.

2888. You refer in your Memorandum to Communal representation. When you make Communal representation for ninety-seven people out of 100 is not that making arrangements to the exclusion of three rather than to the representation of the ninety-seven?—I do not agree.

2889. I put it to you that that is the common sense of that very simple proposition?—The conditions of Madras will have to be taken into consideration when considering that question.

2890. Well, I put it to you?—With great respect, I do not agree.

2891. You go on to say that you object to the proposals of the Bill because of the possible unpopularity of Ministers as compared with Executive Councils in the matter of taxation. I want to ask you if you think that under any system any plan can be devised by which taxation can be other than unpopular?—I will submit one thing. If taxation is such that it would directly go for the benefit of those who are paying the tax, it need not be as unpopular as it would otherwise be.

2892. Are you speaking as a taxer now or as a payer of taxes?—I think I must be taken as a payer of taxes.

2893. Under the dual form of government, as it seems to be irrevocably called, you say the Minister's opinion and influence will not be reflected in the administration of reserved subjects. Is it not provided in the Report that there shall be consultation betwen the two divisions of the Government in regard to all matters?—I do not think that is sufficient to bring about that united front which is expected. Naturally, there will be friction and trouble; we cannot avoid it when you divide them into two Governments.

2894. Another objection you raise is the trouble regarding the Public Services and their position under Ministers in transferred subjects. Do you take it for granted that the Public Services—I suppose you mean both European and Indian—will object to work under Ministers with transferred subjects?—I was thinking of the European services then.

2895. You take it for granted that they will object?—I do not think it will be the same objection as is considered in other quarters, but I think there will be some objection on the part of some of the Civil Servants.

2896. You say another objection is judging the system of Government by the efficiency of the Minister. Do you not think that is a pretty fair test?—I could think of a better test, because I want to judge by the entire Legislative Council, and not by the individual Ministers. To judge it by the work of three Ministers is not so good as to judge it by the whole Council.

2897. Another objection is the opposition of Local Governments to the dual system. Do you refer to one particular Government? Have you in your mind your own Local Government?—There are five other heads of Governments who opposed.

2898. You say that the conditions obtaining in the Madras Presidency are peculiar and without a parallel in any other part of India; are you familiar with other parts of the Madras Presidency than the northern Circars?—I am not intimately familiar with them, but I know them to some extent.

2899. You will allow that it is a somewhat confident statement to make that conditions are without parallel in any other part of India when you have no experience experience of the Tamil or the Malayalam conditions of your own Province?—I have sufficient experience of the Tamil country which will entitle me to speak of that part.

2900. You are a lawyer?—Yes.

2901. You have heard of petitio principii?—I do not know Latin.

2902. You say the spirit of sectarianism amongst certain castes is greatest in the Madras Presidency. Again, how can you pretend to decide that?—I see so much of it every day.

2903. But you do not see so much of it everywhere else every day?—No.

2904. You will allow that knowledge must be comparative, and that it is a very difficult thing to say?—Yes. Only such value will be given to it as will be compatible with that.

2905. Therefore, you say, the cleavage between Brahmins and non-Brahmins is widest in Madras; they belong to different castes, which makes it impossible to inter-marry, and you say their interests are not often identical. How do you prove that? Are not Brahmins and non-Brahmins members of one great Hindoo system to which you yourself belong?—Yes.

2906. Tell me why their interests are often not identical?—Because the interests are different. We have one religion, but our interests are different.

2907. How?—Supposing a question of taxation arises. Land being there settled, it will be ready and handy to be taxed by adding to the assessment two annas on the rupee. The Minister will think that that is the easiest thing to do. The Brahmins do not pay a tax on the land.

2908. Why?—Because they managed to get the ancient Rajahs to let them have it rent-free.

2909. Is it not because they are really poor, and have little or no land?—I do not admit that they are poor.

2910. You can easily find out at the India Office how much land is held by Brahmins. You say the Brahmins claimed to be Aryans, while non-Brahmins are treated as Dravidians. Is not that a long time ago?—Can we change our nationality by time?

2911. Is it not very much the same thing to say that English people are divided into Normans, Saxons, and Danes at the present time?—Certainly not. There is this great difference: You inter-marry, and we cannot. The race idea involves the idea of blood, and the tie of blood is avoided there. How can they be the same as in England?

2912. Has not the blood got very much mixed in many centuries?—I cannot say that.

2913. Would you say it was not so? My honourable friend next me called your attention to the statement that the non-Brahmins are almost entirely illiterate, consequently I shall not trouble you to ask you any question designed to show that that is a totally inaccurate statement. I will only ask you this: In your experience in Madras have you heard of Runganatham Mudaliar Sir Sankaran Nair?—Yes.

2914. And Dr. Nair?—Yes.

2915. Could you not reel off at the ends of your fingers some of the greatest men who have ever been known in the Madras Presidency who were non-Brahmins?—Two or three swallows do not make a summer.

2916. You say where the average ryot does take a part in politics his mind is made up for him by his landlord or his banker?—That is not mine; that comes from better authorities than myself.

2917. Since you quote it, I will ask you whether you are prepared to commit yourself to the statement that the average ryot, whom other witnesses have described as an eminently practical and sensible person, has his mind made up for him by his landlord, or his priest? Do you seriously adopt that statement?—I put it in this way—by his lawyer and by the official.

2918. You do not adopt that statement?—That is also true, but in my Province the greater predominance is from the official and the lawyer. Certainly the banker will be approached.

2919. I asked you about the landlord and the priest. It is not in italics here?—It is quoted.

Chairman.

2920. What is it a quotation from?—From the Joint Report.

Sir J. D. Rees.

2921. Do you agree with it, or not?—I do.

2922. You give a list of the population of the Madras Presidency classified; you call the depressed class six millions odd?—Yes.

2923. Do these depressed classes include Nairs in your list? No; they do not.

2924. Do they include the Chettis?—No.

2925. Do they only include the lower classes?—Yes.

2926. You say the Brahmins form a small percentage of the population, but owing to a variety of causes almost all the power and influence has been concentrated in their hands. Is not intelligence one of the chief causes?—If by intelligence is meant the capacity to adjust themselves to circumstances, and to pass examinations in which cramming is the first ingredient.

2927. You spoke of the low caste just now. No doubt the Committee would infer that they were outcastes. May I ask you if a pariah and a madiga are members of a caste, or are they outcastes?—They are outcastes in one sense.

2928. If you had a man in the witness box, and you asked him what his caste was, would he say "I am a pariah," or would he say "I have no caste"?—He says "I am a pariah."

2929. And that is part of the Hindoo system. You say nine seats were captured by the Brahmins out of ten in 1916?—Yes.

2930. Are you aware that until quite recently in this country the seats in Parliament were almost entirely won by those who came from public schools, universities, county families, and so forth?—That does not go by caste.

2931. Is there a Panchama caste or is that a political invention?—It is as old as Manu. I could show the name of Panchama in Manu.

2932. Does any man describe himself as belonging to the Panchama caste?—He will say Mala or Madiga.

2933. Would he describe himself as of the Panchama caste?—Yes, some do.

2934. You suggested that the Mala or caste name in your district was for pariah the same thing as malas, the Latin for "bad"; and mal, the French for "bad"; do you seriously put that before the Committee?—It was actually explained by Theosophists by saying that Mala magnetism will pass from the Malas if we approach them.

2935. Do you seriously put that to the Committee?—I do not believe it. I would embrace him as my brother if I could.

2936. You drew a moving picture of the position of the lower castes in the Brahmin quarter?—That is the case in every village.

2937. You said when you got to the Brahmin quarter you were not allowed to go any further?—That is not my statement.

Chairman.

2938. What was it you said?—I said the Brahmins will accompany me as far as the Panchama hamlet, and as soon as we reach that they will fall back.

Sir J. D. Rees.

2939. Does the Government of the country enforce these conditions, and the Magistracy?—If that is so we would not have fought for the continuance of the British Empire, as we have done.

2940. Is it not public opinion which enforces them?—There is no public opinion, except the opinions of lawyers, in India.

2941. There is no public opinion in India?—No.

2942. Do you say there is no public opinion in India?—It does exist in some educated opinion; what is called public opinion is the opinion of lawyers and educated people who form a very small percentage.

Sir J. D. Rees.] Do you suggest that your fellow-countrymen are cruel people? If they were not cruel, would they maintain this system which you explain in moving terms as being so unfair to the lower classes?

Chairman.] I do not think it was quite put in that way.

Sir J. D. Rees.

2943. I will leave it. (To the witness): Do you accept the principle of competition as the proper means of staffing a Government service?—Up to a certain degree to ensure efficiency, not beyond that degree.

2944. You

2944. You accept it, but qualified?—Yes.

2945. Would you modify it when the Brahmins came out to the top of all the competitions?—I will not put it in that way. Put a certain standard which is necessary for you to do the work which is required, and see if Brahmins are prepared to answer that test. Do not let examinations be the test.

2946. You said the non-caste schools should have non-caste teachers?—No; I said they have now.

2947. I thought you said that non-caste schools should have non-caste teachers. What did you say?—I said in all the Panchama schools under my control no Brahmin teacher would be willing to serve, but I had to appoint a Mohammedan or non-Brahmin or an Indian Christian.

2948. Then you think the Brahmin teacher is far better?—It is not a question of efficiency there; it is the willingness of the particular caste to serve in particular places.

2949. Why do you want him, if he is not better?—I did not put it that I wanted him. I will appoint as many non-Brahmins as possible.

2950. You realise that the British Government is bound by the Proclamation of Queen Victoria to respect the castes and customs of the people, do you not?—So far as it was in the Proclamation of 1858 we are all bound.

2951. You say the non-Brahmins are the landholders, the farm proprietors and the producers who pay almost the entire taxes of the country?—Yes.

2952. Then how do you account for what you call the predominance of the Brahmins if it is not their superior intelligence?—Their place in the Public Services reflects on the Public Offices and the elections.

2953. You think that till now the Britisher—by which I suppose you mean the Indian civil servant—has ruled. Has he tolerated all this oppression which you have described of the lower castes by the higher castes?—Will you refer me to the paragraph?

2954. It is Paragraph 4, but we shall not have time to refer to it. You say that the Indian civil servant has ruled in India till now, and in spite of that these oppressions have gone on?—Yes.

2955. But the agents of the Government were chiefly Brahmins, were they not—those who carried on the Government under the Indian Civil Service?—Yes. mostly Brahmins.

2956. On page 5 you say: "When non-Brahmin leaders in Madras contemplated these changes, when they remembered what the Brahmins have hitherto been, how they monopolised all the places of influence in the Public Services"?—I understand you to say that the Indian civil servant showed integrity, fair play, and detachment?—Yes.

2957. But his own agents were mostly Brahmins?—But he cannot control his agents in the way that he would himself control. He could give us justice, he could hold the scales even between Indian and Indian, but when it comes to ourselves it is different.

2958. You see no inconsistency there?—No: on the contrary, it proves my point.

2959. On page 7 you say: "In the case of the non-Brahmin caste Hindoos, to which category the great majority of voters will belong, there is a general feeling of apprehension that, under any scheme of purely territorial electorates, most of the seats would be captured by the Brahmins." Do you think that in a territorial electorate, those who have less land, are likely to have most influence?—The word "territorial" there is taken from the Madras Government's phraseology, which is equal to the general electorates in the Bill.

2960. You say, speaking of the Brahmins: "Their experience and their educational superiority would give the Brahmins great advantages in canvassing, while their traditional, social and religious pre-eminence and their talents for organisation would be utilised to extend their political influence outside their own class." You say that would be so in the twentieth century in India?—What you are reading is from a quotation from the Indian Government.

2961. Do you think they have?—That is a quotation.

2962. Do you agree with it?—Yes, entirely.

2963. You say if ever the Government of Madras was partial it was partial on the side of the Brahmins until now?—Yes.

2964. What brought about this very great and sudden change?—I can give examples. All the three Executive members were Brahmins; all the Dewans appointed are Brahmins——

2965. That is not my question. You say the Government of Madras was all on the side of the Brahmins if they were partial; now they are taking the lead on the side of communal representation for non-Brahmins. I ask you if you can explain the reason of that sudden, complete change of front on the part of the Madras Government?—I think Lord Pentland will be here, and he will be able to explain it more than I.

Chairman.] That is not a fair question. How can he tell what the Government of Madras think?

Sir J. D. Rees.] He might have an idea.

Witness.] I had never any talk with Lord Pentland on these matters; I am too low for that.

2966. Have you in the Norther Circa ever seen any effort made to enforce the doctrine of pollution distance?—I gave instances in which certain persons are not allowed to pass through certain streets.

2967. Have you seen the pollution distance enforced in ordinary streets; that no men of certain castes may come within a certain number of feet of a Brahmin?—I have seen people being prevented from going into a street.

2968. You came to represent the non-Brahmins; are you aware that there is another body here which claims to do that, and, I believe, does not altogether accept you views?—They do claim communal representation, and they want the number of Brahmin seats to be limited, and they agree with us a long way. Perhaps they might not agree with me on the question of separate electorates.

2969. On page 15 of your Memorandum you say: "So long as the present inequality based on the accident of birth continues in India a common race and a single nationality seems an impossibility. By a system of communal representation and by the gradual evolution of responsible government we expect to create equality, which in its turn renders intermarriage possible and feasible, and with it, in fullness of time, a common race and perhaps a nationality." Is the Committee to infer that your programme is not only to obtain communal representation, but to break down the existing caste system?—Yes, certainly it must be broken down if possible.

2970. On the communal system you say on page 16: "It is said that communal representation may be claimed by a minority with some show of reason, but that it is unthinkable that a majority, and that a vast majority, should demand it. The obvious answer to this kind of objection is that the Mohammedans in the Punjab and in Bengal had already been given communal electorates, though they happen to be in the majority." Then you refer to the Punjab and Bengal. I ask you whether the majority there is not a very narrow majority, and whether there is not the all-important distinction of religion?—So long as it is a majority I do not think it matters whether it is a large or a small majority.

2971. There is a difference of religion?—Yes.

2972. The people whom you represent to-day and the Brahmins have one religion?—Assuming there are no controlling influences behind.

2973. You say the English-educated are the persons most interested in the elections of the near future. Do you assume they will all support the Bill and the Report?—It is not for that purpose. We cannot be judged by the mere numbers either of the population or of the voters generally; we must be judged by the number of voters literate in English, because those are the politically minded classes. When you take that into account you find the Brahmins in the majority.

2974. I understand you are not anti-Brahmin, but only anti-caste?—That word "anti" I do not like. I would be glad to see caste out of India.

2975. Your

2975. Your association and others of like minds and with like objects in view did not appear before Lord Southborough's Committee?—I did not. I am only speaking for my association. I was invited, but I did not go.

2976. Have you given your reasons in this Memorandum?—I think so.

Marquess of Crewe.

2977. You have just said that you would not wish to be called anti-Brahmin. Have you many friends or acquaintances among the Brahmin community yourself?—I have some.

2978. You told us a great deal about what you considered to be Brahmin intolerance and the Brahmin pressure which is likely to be placed on the rural elector. Would you say that the pressure is mainly social and civil or mainly religious?—It is a combination of all, I should think. It is impossible to extract one thing from another.

2979. You are aware that you can only make people do something which they do not want to do either by cajoling them or frightening them. Which do you consider is the method of which you are afraid in its application to the rural voter?—The fear that is operating.

2980. It is a question of terrorism?—Yes. Perhaps terror is a strong word; I would say, undue influence.

2981. They are afraid of offending the Brahmins partly, because of worldly results through their predominance in the law and locally, and partly because they are afraid of spiritual results. Is that so?—I would place the first on a higher footing. This religious business is a very small affair.

2982. You do not regard the Brahmins as principally the religious caste?—They are a religious caste in a sense. When my daughter is married I shall have to invite a Brahmin, and I shall have to wash his feet and pour the water on my head, and until I do that he will not perform the marriage of my daughter, and if he does not perform it the marriage will be illegal and the offspring will be illegitimate. I do not think when it comes to a question of politics that that will operate.

2983. I am glad to know that, because we have heard of religious pressure in many parts of Europe being exercised by priests and others. You do not think that that particular form of pressure is so much to be feared as a social, civil pressure?—No; it is there, but it is not so great as the other.

2984. You consider that that pressure is formidable enough to outweigh the enormous predominance of numbers which the non-Brahmins possess?—I believe so.

2985. You said at the beginning of your evidence that you rather resented the suggestion that you, the non-Brahmin community, and the Government of Madras were working together?—I did.

2986. And that you were merely backing them up?—Yes.

2987. In that connection you spoke of the Government of Madras as being altogether opposed to reform. You meant, I take it, that the Government of Madras have expressed opposition to the particular scheme of reform known as the Montagu-Chelmsford Report?—Yes: I had that in view.

2988. You did not imply that the Government of Madras as constituted at the time was opposed to any kind of reform in India, did you?—I had in mind only the joint report scheme.

2989. You did not mean to bring that particular charge against Lord Pentland and the Government of Madras of being anti-reformers altogether?—No.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

2990. You have given your illustrations of the way in which elections would work in Madras. The number of the non-Brahmins is twenty-seven millions, is it not?—Yes 2991. And of the Brahmins?—One and a quarter millions.

2992. In your illustration you bring in the attitude of the pro-Brahmin non-Brahmin?—Yes.

2993. What number do you put them at out of the twenty-seven millions?—That is rather a difficult question. We profess to represent all the twenty-seven millions ourselves, and they profess to represent all the twenty-seven millions themselves. Those that actually took part in this would be a few hundreds or thousands; just like Brahmins saying they represent the whole nation, we say we represent all those communities. Strictly speaking, I was told that at one Conference there were sixty members present. That was at the last Conference held in December last. That was the report in our paper. The next day they wanted to fill up the numbers and they indented upon the services of a labour union and filled their hall with 100 mill-hands. I was not present at the meeting, but if that is correct they must be representing about one-fifth or one-sixth of what we do. I have no definite figures on that.

2994. How will that work out out of the twenty-seven millions? If you were asked to make an estimate, how many pro-Brahmin non-Brahmins would there be out of the twenty-seven millions?—I do not expect more than three non-Brahmins of my school coming in. We will have to take into account the influence of the Brahmins operating at the same time. It is not merely the influence of the pro-Brahmin non-Brahmins. By themselves they may not be able to get much, but all the influences which will be at work when the electorate is joint will be also at work when the Brahmins take it into their heads to see their men returned.

2995. The figures which you give as to what would happen in these elections are really conjectural. They are not based upon anything?—No: we have had the test of previous experience—one out of ten.

2996. You gave as a reason for not going before Lord Southborough's Commission that you were not satisfied with its composition?—That is so.

2997. How many in number is the Commission?—I think there are six or seven.

2998. Of those, how many did you disapprove of?—Only two.

2999. Of those five I think you say here that you have nothing to complain of?—About the Chairman or the European members we have nothing to complain of, or the Mohammedan member.

3000. On page 21 you quote the testimony of the confidence in the English official because of his integrity, fairplay and detachment?—Yes.

3001. That is your own statement as well as a quotation?—Yes.

3002. You adopt that?—Yes.

3003. Do you think it was wise when you get a Commission with five impartial men on it, even though you objected to the other two, to let your case go by default? If I may mention the circumstances under which it happened I will make it clear. Apart from the circumstance of the presence of two Brahmin gentlemen whose opinions were known to be hostile to us, and who would naturally be expected to have the ear of other members of the Committee, we had other reasons at the time, and I think I had better mention them. A week before the Committee was going to sit there was a meeting of the South Indian Liberal Federation. At that meeting opinion was divided, and it appeared that if we should go and give evidence there would be a split in our camp. We wanted to avoid that, and one of the reasons given there was this most important reason, namely, that we put in petitions to the Indian Government, to the Madras Government, and we were not even given the ordinary reply that our matter would be considered. That was felt as an insult by most of the members. The Committee was already in Madras at that time, and various rumours reached us that before the Committee arrived in Madras most of the members were approached by the Brahmin members, and therefore there was not much chance of our succeeding there. We may be right or wrong in our conjectures, but that was our apprehension, and it operated on us.

3004. On that principle would you have refused to appear before this Committee if a rumour had reached you that certain members of it had already made up their minds against your case?—We should not do that, because we always rely on the British sense of justice and fairplay, and England is different from India. The free atmosphere of England is not there.

3005. If you felt such a difficulty in appearing before the Committee on which two Brahmins were sitting do you expect to have a really independent view taken by any non-Brahmins who are returned to a Legislative Council in which Brahmins will be sitting?—At any rate, they will represent their own men, who are 90 per cent. I do not say that non-Brahmins will represent Brahmin views. We are not excluding them. They will have their representatives and they will express their opinions.

3006. Can you give us any precedent for giving separate representation to a party who are in a great majority so that they shall not be overwhelmed by the minority?—That question is answered by Mr. Sastri in the quotation I give in the Memorandum.

3007. On what page?—It is on page 12, paragraphs 3 or 4. It begins with: "It is unusual to make special arrangements for the protection of an immense and overwhelming majority, but it is also unusual for a numerically small caste to enjoy a decisive ascendency over most other classes in culture and social and political influence."

3008. That is only a statement that the Brahmin position is so strong that whatever the numbers they will dominate the non-Brahmins. That is really what it comes to?—That is a fact, though it may be very difficult for Englishmen to understand it, because you have nothing of the kind to compare with it in your land. With great respect, let it not be misunderstood. It is the peculiar conditions of the Province in which we are living. We know these things.

3009. You use an expression on page 3 in your answers to questions. You point out that such a colossal measure as the present reform scheme, with far-reaching consequences, cannot be ushered in when vast majorities are groaning at the very threshold?—Yes.

3010. Can you say truly that vast majorities are groaning at the threshold when a Commission is appointed to inquire into their case, and they will not appear before it?—They will not appear. Only the surface will appear before the Committees. The real India will not be here.

3011. What I desire to obtain from you is this: If vast majorities are groaning at the threshold it is because they have not been heard; but can people be heard if they do not make their case?—Your Lordship will have to take the representatives representing those vast majorities. Possibly 80 per cent. or 70 per cent. of the Indians know nothing about these matters at all.

Mr. Montagu.

3012. You said just now that you objected to appear before the Southborough Committee because you objected to two of the men who formed that Committee?—Yes; and there are other reasons also.

3013. You also said that this question was a question for Madras alone?—Yes.

3014. The Committee had to deal with the whole of India?—Yes.

3015. And when it reached Madras two members were added with technical knowledge of Madras?—Yes.

3016. Both these men were non-Brahmins?—Yes; one an Indian Christian.

3017. They were neither of them Brahmins?—No.

3018. And yet that did not give you confidence?—It did not.

3019. The two men you objected to were Mr. Sastri and Mr. Banerjea?—That is so.

3020. On page 12 of your Memorandum you quote from the writings or speeches of Mr. Sastri?—Yes, writings.

3021. Would you say that those showed that Mr. Sastri entered upon his task hostile to your claims that some solution of the difficulty should be found?—It would be rather a difficult thing for me to put any such construction upon the character of one who has been regarded as one of our ablest men in the country; but, with all respect, and without meaning anything offensive against him, I must say that his speech in the Imperial Legislative Council, in which he said that the non-Brahmins of Madras would prefer a Brahmin oligarchy to a British bureaucracy was cutting to all of us. We could not think of the idea of replacing the British bureaucracy by a Brahmin oligarchy. As I said in my Memorandum, the British bureaucracy may have many faults, but, as your poet said, with all her faults we love England still.

Mr. Montagu—continued.

3022. That is very interesting, but it is not an answer. You quote from Mr. Sastri's writings?—Yes.

3023. And yet, despite those writings, you believe that he was so prejudiced a Brahmin that you could not appear before a tribunal of which he was one member and which contained three Indian non-Brahmins? That is so?—I did not quite catch the question.

3024. There were three Indian non-Brahmins on the Commission when it sat in Madras?—Including a Mohammedan and the local members; but the local members had very little voice, we thought. They are co-opted members who have no right to sign the Report, and who could at best advise the members of the Committee.

3025. What is a non-Brahmin? When you claim communal representation for non-Brahmins, whom do you include?—We include all the Hindoos who are neither Panchamas nor Brahmins. Of course, Panchamas will come as non-Brahmins, because though separate representation is allowed to them in the shape of nominated members, they are allowed to vote with us.

3026. You want communal representation for caste non-Brahmins?—It practically comes to that.

3027. And communal representations for Panchamas, or are you satisfied with nominations?—I would look for the day when they can have an election of their members.

3028. And communal representation for Mohammedans, or do you include them as non-Brahmins?—They have got it.

3029. You welcome that; you approve of that?—Of separate representation for them.

3030. And communal representation for Indian Christians?—Yes, I approve that also.

3031. What you are really asking for is communal representation for the Brahmins, are you not?—It may come to that, certainly.

3032. One of the reasons why you object to the reservation of seats is because you are afraid of the influence of the Brahmins, because you fear that you will have returned what is called a pro-Brahmin non-Brahmin?—That is so.

3033. Do not you fear that just as much in a communal electorate?—No.

3034. Why not? I understand from you that a Brahmin is a very clever person, a master of electioneering tactics, who will see that in a mixed electorate with seats reserved for non-Brahmins he so influences the votes of the non-Brahmins that they vote for a man whom he approves. Cannot he do that in a communal electorate just as well?—No, for this reason: One who is within the fold, as we say, will certainly have a greater influence than one who is outside the electorate, and one who is a voter in the electorate will have so many opportunities of talking to those persons who will be in touch with other voters, and will be naturally sought after. One who is outside the electorate will not have the same influence. This is an example which occurred in a municipality close to me. There were eleven members on the Municipal Council just then sitting. Anyone who gets six votes will succeed as chairman. Outsiders can also stand as chairman for election. One Brahmin and one non-Brahmin of my school were candidates. Besides those a third, a pro-Brahmin non-Brahmin, who was a member of the Municipal Council, was also a candidate. Now the pro-Brahmin non-Brahmin secured the seat. He could not vote himself. There are five non-Brahmin votes and four Brahmin votes. Those five non-Brahmins wanted to vote for my man. This pro-Brahmin non-Brahmin had only one vote, that of the doctor of the place. What he said was to the non-Brahmins, "If you give me all your five votes my one and your five will make me six. If you do not vote for me I can withdraw from the contest, and myself and my voter can both join the four Brahmin votes, which will make six, and the Brahmin candidate will succeed." The non-Brahmins, though they had their own candidate ready, seeing that a Brahmin would come in, were obliged to give all their five votes to this pro-Brahmin non-Brahmin so that a non-Brahmin should come in. A single voter thus has been able to influence five votes.

Mr. Montagu—continued.

3035. Of course, I do not want to argue with you. This is the case you desire the Committee to believe, as I understand, that if you have a Brahmin and a non-Brahmin living side by side, if they both vote at the same election the non-Brahmin will do what the Brahmin tells him?—Yes.

3036. But if they do not vote at the same election the Brahmin will not be able to influence his non-Brahmin neighbour?—Not as much as in the other case.

3037. You gave us a very moving picture of the insanitary conditions in the Panchama hamlets in the country that you know. I think you said they were, as a matter of fact, indescribable?—Yes.

3038. Have you ever known any Brahmin take any interest in improving the conditions under which the Panchama lives?—It is rather a difficult question to answer. My answer would be this: Some Brahmins interested in social reform have made very excellent speeches on public platforms. For 30 years Indian social reform conferences have been held, and at least half a dozen of those I put the question to them point-blank—I was also a member of the conference—"What have you done for the Panchamas? You have done something for the widows because they are your own girls, you see the girl in your own house every day, and you cannot help it. But what have you done for the Panchamas except opening a night school here and a night school there?" We live in our splendid mansions; we go to Court in motor-cars; and we sleep in our own houses. It is impossible to say that high Brahmins could ever understand really. I do not say there may not be one or two gentlemen who take an interest in these matters. It is quite possible, though I have not come across many, but that is an exception which proves the rule.

3039. Therefore you would say that taking it as a whole Brahmin interest in social improvement for the depressed classes is not genuine; it is merely pretence and nothing more?—That has been my impression for a long time, with a few honourable exceptions.

3040. I think you said earlier that you had no hostility to Brahmins?—That is so. I may be wrong in my views, but I have no hostility.

3041. You said, in answer to Lord Sydenham, that the rigidity of caste was getting stronger in Madras?—Yes.

3042. Would you say that is the case all over India?—No; I do not say that.

3043. Would it be fair to say it was getting less rigid in other parts of india?—I should accept that proposition if stated by one who knows.

3044. You think it is possible it is getting less rigid all over India but more rigid in Madras?—My knowledge of the other parts is only small. Considering that non-Brahmins are rising equally well with Brahmins in other parts, I should think it must be so.

3045. Have you ever heard of any co-operative society in Madras in which Panchamas and Brahmins share in the management?—I heard it first from your speech in the House of Commons.

3046. Did it surprise you?—Well, it did not surprise me for this reason: That is a thing which people would do for various reasons. I do not put it as an index of the feelings of Brahmins towards the Panchamas.

3047. Would it have happened 100 years ago; would a Brahmin and a Panchama have sat down together to deliberate 100 years ago.?—I should like to know whether they did really sit in the Committee side by side.

3048. I believe, as a matter of fact, there was a slight difference in level, but would they have come so close together 100 years ago?—It is not likely. It all depended upon the state of the country. When Mohammedan rule was oppressive there was reason for them to combine, and they might sit together. It depends upon the particular stage of progress.

3049. I want to be quite sure we have not misunderstood you. I want to give you an opportunity of altering it if you wish. Do you really mean to tell this Committee that the rigidities and asperities of caste distinction are getting worse in your Presidency?—In my Presidency whenever any questions of politics and public services arise.

3050. If the condition of Panchamas in their hamlets is so bad, is it not fair to say that they will be particularly interested in any political agitation for an improvement of their conditions?—That is rather a difficult thing to say, because their condition of ignorance is so great that we cannot think of any political ideas entering their heads.

3051. Supposing you went into a Panchama hamlet, and supposing you went to a Panchama who had a vote, and supposing you were to say to that Panchama "If you return me to Parliament, to the Assembly, to the Council, I shall spend my whole time in trying to improve the condition of the houses in which Panchamas live," do not you think that would influence his vote if he did not like the squalor?—It ought to, but under existing circumstances I would like to see some example of that beforehand. If you nominate two or three men now, and they are found useful, they will understand the value of a vote then, and then they will come round. Till they see the great examples of members doing good for them any amount of preaching or lecturing would be of no avail.

3052. Do you seriously say that when the Legislative Council has real power to alter things such as sanitation, then votes will continue, just as in the past, to be determined by the religion or caste of the candidate?—I should honestly think that is so, because of the caste predominance there.

3053. People will vote on religious grounds rather than on anything else?—I do not call it religious—on caste lines.

3054. You approve of reform if you can get communal representation?—Yes.

3055. And yet you believe that those who vote for the Legislative Councils will always be influenced by caste rather than by the question that has to be considered?—That word "always" is what I cannot follow. It does in most cases in which the caste point comes. In a national question, in a crisis like the world war, or any question which affects the whole country certainly they will work together; but there are a hundred and one cases in which every day we have to come across questions between Brahmins and non-Brahmins. I have given several instances.

3056. On the Local Boards you told us things had got a little better recently?—Yes.

3057. Is not that because the Local Boards have more power, and therefore the non-Brahmins were more interested in getting their own representatives?—It was because the Brahmins of superior ability have their ambitions roused, and are looking forward to the higher councils, and except as a stepping stone they do not care for these honours.

3058. Have you ever fought an election yourself against a Brahmin?—Yes. In fact, I have just come away from an election. I gave it up and came here. That was a month ago. I was told my Brahmin rival was returned, though there was another candidate, of non-Brahmin descent, of sixty or seventy years of age and with an experience in public life of thirty years. That is by the way. Previous to that I contested twice and continued the contest another time, in all, four elections.

3059. You fought several elections?—Yes.

3060. Can you tell us at all what sort of majority you were beaten by?—I do not remember well; it is such a long time ago.

3061. Well, the last election?—I came away.

3062. The last election which you did fight?—About eleven votes.

3063. You were beaten by eleven votes?—Yes.

3064. In what sort of constituency?—In a constituency in which the Brahmins are about one-third or one-fourth, and the rest are non-Brahmins.

3065. How many electors were there altogether? How many went to the poll?—About 220 attended the poll, though there were 260 total voters.

3066. You were beaten by eleven votes?—Yes.

3067. Did you make speeches to your electors?—I did.

3068. Did you circulate pamphlets to them?—I did.

3069. Did you canvass?—I did.

3070. And yet you regarded it as hopeless that you could convert those eleven voters to vote the other way?—It is not the eleven voters. That is just the number that turned the scale. What about the others?. There are a number of others who would have to be taken.

3071. That election was decided by eleven voters?—Yes; I did my best; I could not convert them.

Mr. Montagu—continued.

3072. And you could never do so?—As long as Brahmin predominance in public offices is continued.

3073. You never met with a Liberal candidate who stood for the City of Birmingham in this country?—No.

3074. You are quite clear that nine-tenths of the seats would go to Brahmins in a general election?—That is judged by past experience.

3075. No effort you make could possibly get over that difficulty?—In past elections I did all I could possibly do, and I can claim to be a bit of a speaker in Telugu.

3076. You said in your answers to questions that the members of the Legislative Council have had no influence upon policy up to the present. Will not it make a difference when they have some influence?—It will be a great change the other way, because when the Brahmins get into power they will consolidate it to our detriment.

3077. You said in your answers to questions: "We also respectfully beg to state that we do not expect sufficient sympathy from the present Madras Government." Now what do you mean by that?—If I am asked I am bound to tell you, but you will be pleased to see it is not my intention to disclose any information that I have got. His Excellency Lord Willingdon, or rather his private secretary, wired to me that His Excellency would be pleased to see me if I would go to Madras.

3078. I do not really want to press you if you say that you do not want to tell, but you mean there is a difference between this Government and the last Government in Madras?—In their opinions as regards the question of communal representation.

3079. Could you tell the Committee who Mr. Watney is, who is the secretary of your deputation?—He is a friend of Dr. Nair. That is the only gentleman to whom we were introduced after our arrival here. We wanted some papers or Parliamentary Reports and other things, and Dr. Nair was ill, and we looked to him for help. He could not do anything, but he said. "I know Mr. Watney; he is a friend of mine; he will give you any help you require."

3080. Has he been in India? Is he conversant with the conditions in Madras?—He was in India. He seems to have travelled throughout the Madras Presidency.

3081. What you might call a pro-non-Brahmin non-Brahmin?—A British pro-non-Brahmin.

3082. You know this claim you are making for communal representation for non-Brahmins is very hotly contested in Madras itself by other political associations?—I concede it; I quoted those resolutions.

3083. But by other Madras representatives who have been here?—You are referring to the Madras Presidency Association?

3084. Other gentlemen who have been here from Madras have very strongly opposed the suggestion you have made?—I presume Brahmin gentlemen from Madras.

3085. It may well be; but certainly there are very many politicians in Madras who are opposed to your proposal?—Who are now opposed, but who till recently conceded it to us.

3086. Do you suggest that your movement represents the majority of the political interest in Madras?—Politically interested non-Brahmins in Madras.

3087. But politically interested people in Madras?—If you include Brahmins, it does not.

3088. Has it ever occurred to you that if you want something which is opposed by people who are likely to be in a majority, it is possible to form a compromise?—Yes, it ought to be possible. All reasonable men ought to come to some compromise.

3089. Have you ever tried?—I cannot say we tried, but no reasonable terms were ever proposed.

3090. What about this proposal of Mr. Sastri's, which you quote in your memorandum. Did you ever go to Mr. Sastri and suggest that you might hammer out a scheme?—That is rather a difficult matter to say. Questions of dignity will arise, and it is not easy for any one party to offer themselves, because you might not get what you want. If there is some third party prepared to bring about a compromise, that would have a better chance, in my humble opinion.

Mr. Montagu—continued.

3091. Who drew up this document, the three gentlemen who came with you from India?—I am myself responsible for it. One of my friends fair copied it, and he may have made some verbal alterations, but I only am responsible for it.

Lord Sinha.

3092. You have been a member of the Indian National Conference?—Yes.

3093. For many years?—I attended about four Congresses.

3094. During what period?—In 1915, when your Lordship presided at Bombay, I was also at Madras.

3095. Were you in the Congress in 1916 in Lucknow?—Yes; but that was just the time when we were thinking of seceding from the Congress.

3096. In 1916 you were a member of the Congress?—Yes.

3097. And for how many years before?—From 1911, and I believe I attended one Congress earlier than that, in about 1908.

3098. For many years you were a member of Congress?—Yes.

3099. And I suppose your politics generally were those of the Indian National Congress during that period?—Yes.

3100. There was no question of communal representation being asked for, was there?—Yes; there was.

3101. I mean at the Congress?—No.

3102. Was there any resolution with regard to communal representation on any local bodies?—No; so far as the Congress is concerned.

3103. The question was never raised in the Congress itself?—No; not to my knowledge, at any rate.

3104. May I take it that when you were a member on the Congress you considered that that body represented public opinion in India?—It represented the public opirion of the educated classes in India.

3105. You attach importance to that do you not—the public opinion of the educated classes?—I do attach some importance to it.

3106. But not very much?—It may be very much, but it cannot be contrasted with the representation of the lower classes.

3107. I am keeping that question apart?—Certainly, it was an influential body.

3108. Do not treat me as trying to contradict anything you said. Am I right in saying that the classification of Hindoos in Madras may be taken to be this: (1) Brahmins, (2) non-Brahmins, Hindoo castes, and (3) non-caste Hindoos, that is the Panchamas?—Yes.

3109. Now as regards the second, that is the non-Brahmin castes, is it correct to say that though they are generally grouped together as non-Brahmins, they are all equally exclusive and largely antagonistic to one another? Is that a correct description?—I do not admit that.

3110. I am reading to you from the Memorandum of Sir Alexander Cardew which was put to you by Lord Sydenham. There he says this, in paragraph 7, on page 125, Command 141: "Next to the Brahmin sed longo intervallo comes the great group of Hindoo castes, some higher, some lower, generally grouped together as non-Brahmins, but all equally exclusive and largely antagonistic to one another"?—I cannot agree with Sir Alexander there.

3111. That is wrong?—It is too much to say it is wrong.

3112. It is either right or wrong?—I will not accept it wholly as correct.

3113. It is partly wrong?—I should think so.

3114. What part?—Where it says they are mutually antagonistic.

3115. Are they all equally exclusive?—There is some exclusion, but that strong expression cannot be used.

3116. Is there any inter-marriage?—Some, at any rate.

3117. They are not altogether exclusive, but partly exclusive?—Yes, that would express my meaning.

3118. And not largely antagonistic, but partly antagonistic?—Yes; that may fairly represent my view.

3119. Is it correct to say that both the Brahmins and the non-Brahmin castes are the equal oppressors of Panchamas?—No, my Lord, they are certainly not so. A Panchama will not be admitted into the house of a Brahmin. He cannot cross the threshold.

Mr. Montagu.

3120. Ever?—Ever. In the case of a non-Brahmin they come into all the apartments except the kitchen, and in the case of non-Brahmins the landlady, if she happens to have some farm servants, takes care to see that they are fed before she takes meals herself.

Lord Sinha.

3121. Is not that the general Hindoo rule?—Not in the case of Brahmins. Even if a guest in my position comes he will have food after all the Brahmins in the house are fed.

3122. Is it not the fact that the members of all castes must be given their food before the householder?—That is the injunction of the Scriptures perhaps, but, as a matter of fact, the Brahmins dine first, even before a man in my position.

3123. Is that so in all parts of India?—No, only Madras. I do not speak for other Provinces at all.

3124. They are a particularly bad lot in Madras?—With great respect, I must say they are, in my humble opinion in that sense.

3125. The non-Brahmins have many rich men among them, have they not? All the landed class are mostly non-Brahmins?—Yes.

3126. And the wealth is more predominantly non-Brahmin than Brahmin?—If we take the Zamindars into account, yes.

3127. Wealth generally is more in the non-Brahmin classes?—Yes.

3128. Have they done very much to improve the lot of the Panchamas?—I may be permitted to say that we have not much sympathy with the Zamindars. We belong to the democratic class.

3129. Has the wealth of the non-Brahmin class been employed in any degree for the amelioration of the condition of the Panchamas which you have so lucidly described?—I cannot say so, but I wish to supplement my answer. I represent the democratic class of Southern India, and if to-day we find some non-Brahmin Zamindars co-operating with us in any way, as is suggested, it is because it is against a common oppressor. They were oppressed, and they lost their seats, therefore they would like to have our help; but the day will come when we must separate ourselves from those Zamindars. The Brahmins are the intellectual aristocracy, and the Zamindars are the landed aristocracy.

3130. I do not want you to hang essays on any question I ask you. I want to know whether this extremely bad condition of the Panchamas, which I take it is admitted, has in any way been improved by the efforts of the wealthy non-Brahmin people. I put this to you for the purpose of suggesting that your complaint is really a complaint against the wealthy classes generally and the intellectual classes who have hitherto not done as much as they ought to do for their poorer brethren. Is that not the complaint generally?—With one addition, that it has its origin in the religious ordinances which proceeded from the Brahmins. They were the authors of that system.

3131. I will keep that separate for the present. Apart from religion, is not your complaint this: That wealth and intellect, wealth being non-Brahmin and intellect being Brahmin, have not done what they ought to have done for these oppressed or submerged classes?—I should think so. I must answer yes to that.

3132. And is not that a complaint which is being echoed throughout the world at the present moment?—It is rather difficult for me to say. In this country Labour holds important power. There may be a complaint, of course. I have heard in America about swollen fortunes being distributed, but whether it can be said to be of the same nature as in India is another matter.

3133. I am asking whether it is well founded? I only put it to you that in all countries of the world you have the complaint particularly now that the classes better off have not done what they ought to have done for the classes which are not so well off?—Well, I suppose it is a fact, but I cannot speak with certainty, because my knowledge of the rest of the world is so little.

3134. So far as these Panchamas are concerned, their condition has been the same as that you have described for centuries?—That is rather a difficult question, but it must be taken to be so, I presume.

3135. Are you aware of any previous state in which they were better off?—No.

3136. You do not ascribe it, therefore, to anything that has happended in recent years that the Panchamas have come to this miserable condition?—Except by way of an act of omission.

3137. But the omissions have been centuries old?—There are greater opportunities where equality is proclaimed by Great Britain.

3138. I mean that there have been omissions not only now, but always?—There were no opportunties where omissions could play a part hitherto. In the Legislative Councils there were members whose omissions were accountable for some time. If we or the Panchamas had been there rome of those grievances would have been redressed.

3139. You mean if the non-Brahmin castes were there?—Yes.

3140. You would have remedied the grievances of the Panchamas?—I would have done my best to remedy them.

3141. I am not referring to you personally, but I mean the non-Brahmin castes?—Provided the middle and lower classes come in.

3142. Can you refer to any single act which has been done by the non-Brahmin caste to ameliorate the condition of the Panchamas?—It is a matter of daily occurrence. In the villages the Palers are regarded as part of the household, and these Palers will die for you. They are willing to die for us because we treat them so kindly. So far as the Ryots are concerned, the charge cannot be levelled against them.

3143. Do you say the non-Brahmin castes have always behaved kindly towards the Panchamas, and done their best for them?—Not always.

3144. Have they ever done it?—They have done it to a certain extent in the villages in the Palers' families, treating them kindly, and giving them homes, and giving them advances when they are going to be married.

3145. As their tenants?—As servants, of course.

3146. As tenants and servants?—Yes.

3147. In other words, slaves?—"Slaves" is perhaps a very good illustration to express their condition.

3148. And they are the slaves of your castes?—They are the slaves of the nation.

3149. Of the castes which own them?—We do not own them in that sense. It is too much to say that they are our slaves. They are treated as our children.

3150. You were asked whether you agreed with Sir Alexander Cardew's Minute, and you said you did except where it blocked reforms?—Yes. Perhaps I had not the whole if it in view.

3151. Am I right in saying that that was your view with regard to Sir Alexaner Cardew's Minute?—I have not got all those sentences in my mind at one time. There may be another thing to which I may take exception.

3152. Do you consider that the Minute is opposed to reforms—as being in a spirit of opposition to political or constitutional reforms?—I thought it was opposed to the Joint Report scheme.

3153. Or against any political reform?—I did not read it in that light. I was only thinking of the Joint Report scheme.

3154. Did you consider as to whether it was opposed to any reform in the nature of democratic reforms?—I do not think Sir Alexander ever proposed any scheme at all.

3155. Did you think that that Minute of his considers that democratic reforms are impossible in a country like India?—I think he thought they were impossible.

3156. Because of the doctrine of Karma and the institution of caste?—Possibly.

3157. Do you agree that no reforms of a democratic character are possible for India for those reasons or any others?—I would like to have democracy in India, and I am fighting for it as far as lies in my power.

3158. Do you agree it is possible or do you think it is impossible?—It is possible only if facilities are afforded us, like communal representation. Without that it is impossible.

3159. But with that?—It is possible.

3160. Notwithstanding

3160. Notwithstanding the doctrine of Karma and notwithstanding the institution of caste, democratic reforms are possible in India?—They are possible, certainly, provided communal representation is given and is worked out.

3161. Assuming that communal representation is granted, Karma and caste will not make democratic reforms unsuccessful or unworkable?—No. We can work against them with this representation.

3162. Do you know the Indo-European Association?—Yes.

3163. Do you agree with the views of that association with regard to constitutional reforms in India?—I have not seen much of their literature.

3164. Do you know what their opinion is?—I thought they were against reforms or some such thing.

3165. I want to find out what you mean by saying they are against reforms. What did you understand was their view?—That they were against this diarchy—that they would be satisfied if the Legislative Councils are enlarged and time allowed, or some such thing.

3166. I will not press that?—If there is any suggestion that we drew our scheme from the Indo-European Association I am going to prove from published documents that our scheme was the original scheme, and that is what I am presenting now. In 1917 we passed a resolution and I am standing by that.

3167. With regard to these institutions, educational and charitable, from which you said Panchamas are excluded, the other castes are not excluded from those institutions, are they?—No.

3168. The non-Brahmin people are not excluded?—No.

3169. So far, therefore, as opportunities for education are concerned, the non-Brahmin caste people have the same as the Brahmins?—Yes, we had every opportunity; the British Government has therefore done everything.

3170. Therefore those twenty-seven millions you represent have had the same opportunities for education as the Brahmins for the last 150 years?—Opportunities in the sense of places being open if a certain course is followed, but there are blocks in the courses thrown open. The authorities wanted that everybody should be a B.A. in order that he should get an appointment. Your Lordship is aware that the Brahmins are good at remembering things by heart. They could take the Vedas and repeat them. They have been trained to pass examinations. The test applied in our educational system was similar. Those tests are not available for us.

3171. You have not as good a memory as the others?—We have not the inherent capacity to remember things by heart; we admit that. Another thing is that owing to the accident of some of the Brahmins remaining in the Service at the time of the British arrival they had opportunities of pushing their own men which we did not have. If one man is in an office he will have half-a-dozen of his own men in, and those half-a-dozen can pull up others. Such facilities we have not had.

3172. You are aware that Sir Alexander Cardew charges that against non-Brahmin castes also—that they put their own caste men into offices?—I wish it to be distinctly understood that I do not in any way represent Sir Alexander Cardew, and I am not identical with him. I could show concrete instances in which the Madras Government treated the Brahmins more favourably, and did not give non-Brahmins what they were entitled to.

3173. With regard to non-Brahmin caste people, there have been many members of Council, both elected and nominated, have there not?—No, not through this general electorate. In the special electorate, for instance, the landholders' seats were occupied by non-Brahmins, but that is because of the vast extent of the constituency which covers twelve districts, and also non-Brahmins do not pay taxes. Most of the leading Brahmins live in the city and are absentee landlords. They have to pay 1,000 rupees instead of 500 rupees. There will be very few voters in that constituency; in fact no Brahmin has attempted to get into that constituency.

3174. Non-Brahmins have been Dewans in various native States, have they not?—I do not know.

3175. Is not the present Dewan of Travancore a non-Brahmin?—Yes.

3176. So far as native States were concerned there has been no obstacle to the rise of a predominant people non-Brahmin?—There is a good deal of it now in Mysore. A deputation recently waited upon the Maharajah complaining of the domination of Brahmins, and claiming representation in the Legislative Councils and the local bodies and Public Services.

3177. The Maharajah himself is a non-Brahmin?—Yes.

3178. What was his answer,—That he was not prepared to do it.

3179. That he was not prepared to penalise the most intellectual class of his subjects?—I do not know whether his Highness used the word "penalise," nor do I consider the equal sharing of the services by all the people is penalising any class unless it be supposed that that class has a birthright to have all the good things for themselves.

3180. You have seen the letters printed at the end of Lord Southborough's Report?—Yes.

3181. With regard to certain Associations refusing to appear before him?—Yes.

3182. You have said your refusal was due to the presence of Mr. Banerjea and Mr. Sastri. Mr. Sastri's opinions have been already quoted to you?—Yes.

3183. Is there anything in Mr. Banerjea's speeches or writings which gave you an idea that he was prejudiced?—When the Panchamas said they would not allow the Brahmin oligarchy to replace the British bureaucracy, Mr. Banerjea would seem to have said that they should go and join the Germans, and we were treated as enemies.

3184. Where was that?—When the war was going on.

3185. I mean where did Mr. Banerjea say that?—I cannot just now hit upon it. If it be necessary, I shall be able to get it.

3186. Is that all you have against him?—No, I have a good deal. Your Lordship will remember the Congress Resolutions of 1909 to 1914, in which he protested against the separate representation of Mohammedans. Every argument there would now apply to non-Brahmins.

3187. Therefore his opposition to the communal electorates for Mohammedans led you to believe that he would be also against communal electorates for non-Brahmins?—Though I cannot put my finger on the particular passage in which he said that, my impression is strong that he personally is against giving communal representation to non-Brahmins.

3188. He was one of the founders of the Madras Congress?—Yes.

3189. And you had always been working with him?—I was a humble camp follower. They never allowed me to the Committees except in Bombay?

3190. You are aware of the three alternative courses which are dealt with in Lord Southborough's Report with regard to communal electorates?—Yes. Do you refer to Paragraph 26?

3191. Yes, I think it is?—That is possibly in the Indian Government Report.

3192. I am speaking of Lord Southborough's Report at page 9. You have seen those?—Yes.

3193. The three possible solutions of the problem which Lord Southborough deals with?—Yes.

3194. You reject those uncompromisingly, I understand?—It is another matter if it is a question of compromise, but on principle we oppose them.

3195. Are you in favour of accepting one or other of those alternatives, or do you yourself or your association reject the second or third alternatives?—We would certainly prefer a non-Brahmin communal electorate.

3196. But assuming that that is not possible, in default of that, which would you have of the second and third, or have you any further alternative?—The next best, perhaps, is to fix a maximum for Brahmins.

3197. That is to say, limit the number?—Yes.

3198. That is the third alternative dealt with in Lord Southborough's Report. Have you the Report there? If you look at page 9 you will see it. The last sentence of that is, "A further proposal producing much the same result, though with a variation of figures, is to limit the number of Brahmin candidates to be returned by by such constituency, and this course was recommended to us by another section of the non-Brahmin community"?—That is the Presidency Association.

3199. You would prefer it yourself after communal representation?—If my first claim is rejected. If this Committee weighs it and finds it wanting, then, of course, this is the next best.

3200. If you have communal representation these two others do not arise, but if you do not get it which of the others would you have the second or third? I understand the third?—Yes; but I should like to guard myself in answering. If this is treated as a compromise that is another matter. If not, I should stick to my plan.

Chairman.

3201. You are simply asked, putting aside communal representation, which do you dislike the less of those alternatives?—I would certainly, between the two, if they were the only two, prefer fixing a certain maximum for Brahmins, that they should not have more than so many seats.

Lord Sinha.

3202. Are you prepared to make any suggestion as to what you think ought to be the maximum number?—Yes; I did in my memorandum. I gave reasons. Their population is 3 per cent.; they ought to get three. Indian Christians form the same proportion as the Brahmins. They are getting three seats. The Mohammedans are getting thirteen. Therefore half of that will be six; but the Madras Government, in a Memorandum, gave ten. We are prepared to go the length of suggesting twelve as the proper number for them, for this reason: The percentage of voters is one to four; sixty is the total number. One-fifth of that is twelve. That is one of the reasons which would strengthen me in the question of selecting twelve. It is the highest number yet suggested.

3203. That is, their voting strength is one to your voting strength, four?—Yes.

3204. Therefore they ought to have one-fourth of your number?—Yes. But I also mention the other reasons.

3205. You would not attach any importance to their position intellectually, socially, and the point of view of religion?—I do, otherwise their numbers ought to be only three to six. It comes to twelve, because I have taken those things into account. From the basis of population they are only entitled to three.

3206. Is it the fact that the intervention of a Brahmin is necessary for the validity of a marriage amongst non-Brahmins?—It is a difficult question to answer from the point of view of a lawyer. That question is now enagaging the attention of our community. In fact one or two marriages were performed by non-Brahmin priests, but immediately we read a number of articles in the Press saying that the marriage was illegal and the children will be illegitimate.

3207. You mean there is a division of opinion with regard to that?—Yes.

3208. Supposing there is a separate communal electorate for non-Brahmins, the Brahmin will still continue to have his influence on the voters by reason of his religious and social position?—The influence will be much reduced when he is not within the fold.

Lord Islington.

3209. Your description of the Panchama leads one to suppose that there must be very defective administration in the districts. You told us that the sanitary conditions were indescribably bad?—Yes.

3210. What are the present administrative arrangements in those districts with a view to mitigating those evils?—We are trying to increase the number of Panchama schools to begin with. We are trying to have village extensions to find room for them. I examined about 150 houses, and measured the houses, and found for each head I had from 4 to 6 feet of ground.

3211. I merely want to know what the administrative system is. You have Local Boards there?—Yes.

3212. You have given a list here, on page 3 of your Statement, of the relative positions of the Brahmins and the non-Brahmins?—Yes.

3213. That is in the superior service, is it not?—Yes; so far as they go into the civil list.

3214. What is the position in the Provincial and subordinate services?—It is equally so. The proportion will not vary very much. Sub-magistrates are not included in this. About 80 per cent. of the sub-magistrates will be Brahmins.

3215. Have you any figures to show the proportion of Brahmins and non-Brahmins in the administrative system in the districts?—Not just now.

3216. Are you able to say that from your experience and knowledge the presence of a Brahmin as an officer under Local Government has in any way prevented the proper carrying out of his work in that capacity?—I thought I mentioned one instance.

3217. Can you answer?—Yes; it does to some extent.

3218. To a serious extent?—That again depends upon the powers that ought to be given. At present the powers of bodies are not sufficiently high to make the influence felt in public activities—merely schools I suppose, and sanitation and things of that kind. It all depends upon the power with which a body is invested before we can understand the iron grip of that power.

3219. Assuming that the body has got its ordinary power, and a Brahmin has to carry out that power, would you say that the fact of his being a Brahmin would prevent his carrying it out properly?—Especially in sanitary matters. He would not go into a Panchama hamlet; or, when cholera breaks out, he does not administer medicine himself.

3220. In your statement you deal with the Legislative Council, and you say the Legislative Council will have full control under the transferred subjects and will form the portfolios of an independent Ministry, and there need be no rule to that effect. I gather from that paragraph that you are anxious to see a real system of Cabinet control as distinguished from the Ministerial system?—To avoid diarchy—that is the purpose of that.

3221. What is your object in avoiding diarchy?—To reduce the friction which is complained of, to reduce the opportunities for the unpopularity of the Minister who will be responsible for taxation.

3222. And in order to insure unity of control?—Yes.

3223. It has been put to us that if you had that unity of control you could not place the responsibility upon the Minister to the extent that the reform scheme suggests?—I cannot agree with that. The responsibility will always be there. The European members will also be responsible under that scheme.

3224. You would like to see two Europeans and two Indians on all the transferred subjects—the four equally responsible to the Council for the transferred subjects?—Yes.

3225. Supposing something is done by that Council that the Legislative Council disapproved, how are you going to place the Ministerial responsibility on the Indian representatives in the Council?—According to this scheme the whole body is responsible. I do not say that Ministers only should be responsible.

3226. The whole body would be responsible?—Yes.

3227. Would that prevent the discharge of a Minister if the Governor thought fit?—No; the Governor's power will always be there. The whole scheme of the Bill will apply. The Governor can dismiss him.

3228. Would you give the power to the Governor to dismiss any of his Ministers?—Yes.

3229. Whether European or Indian?—Yes.

3230. And to be appointed during his pleasure?—Yes, equally.

3231. All four?—Yes.

3232. That is your scheme?—Yes.

Duke of Northumberland.

3233. I think you said you represented 27 million non-Brahmins?—Yes; I claim to represent them.

3234. Out of a total of 41 millions?—Yes.

3235. What proportion of the 27 millions of the depressed classes?—They are not included. There are six or seven millions.

3236. You mentioned some cases of oppressive action of Brahmins. One instance you gave was that they had had converted certain educational establishments, which were started for non-Brahmins, into Brahmin establishments?—Yes.

3237. Can you explain how that was done. It is a Taluk Board Institution. At this particular time the President of the Taluk Board was a Brahmin. The revenue divisional officials are, by virtue of their office, presidents of the Taluk Board, except where they are given to non-officials. A Brahmin officer happened to be the divisional officer, and the proposal was put forward at the time he was presiding, and though there are some non-Brahmin members on it, they could not open their lips in the presence of the divisional officer, and the resolution was passed. After some time a divisional European officer came and the resolution was promptly cancelled.

3238. Supposing that this offer of self-government had never been made at all, would there have been any strong desire, or any desire at all, on the part of the non-Brahmin population to have self-government?—I should think not. The educated amongst them may perhaps think of getting something, but, as a whole, they do not think of it. It is only the other side which has imbued these ideas into us.

Mr. Acland.

3239. I perceive from what I have heard to-day that whatever this Committee decides we shall not be able to please everybody. Therefore I have been trying to think, not so much of the present, but of the future, as to what system is most likely to lead to what we must all desire—namely, that in political matters the members of your great religion may settle down to political life and activity together. I understand from you that there are now difficuties. One hopes in the course of time (I am talking now of religious difficulties) these sharp differences between Brahmin and non-Brahmin may to some extent be modified. That depends on the gradual evolution of the religious system, which neither of us can foresee. But if, happily, in the course of centuries the religious difficulty diminishes, would not the political difficulty, the difficulty in the way of common interest and action in legislative bodies be intensified rather than diminish by the existence of a separate representation which you are advocating? I feel that as long as there was separate representation the matters of difference between Brahmin and non-Brahmin would tend to be emphasised, and that if all threw their interests together, and the large majority which you represent of those settle down as best you can with the minority which you do not represent, the questions in which you differ may recede in importance, and you may find ways of co-operating together, because, after all, in the long run, if a man wants to be elected he has to pay some attention to the real interests of those who elect him. Looking ahead to the future and the stage of reform recommended under the Joint Report is only a stage towards something further: Do you think your proposal of communal representation is really in the best interests of the common co-operation of members of the same religion, which you must desire as much as anyone else?—Yes, I should think so, for this reason: The Mohammedans, for instance, were at loggerheads with Hindoos prior to 1909. Every election was fought on the ground that one was Mohammedan and the other Hindoo, and the feeling between them was very bitter, as can be seen from the resolutions of the Congress. After 1909, when separate representation was given to the Mohammedans and their seats secured, that rapprochement about which we hear so much at present has become possible. To-day we find the representatives of Mohammedans and Hindoos meeting together, drafting constitutions which are binding upon both parties, and which are accepted by the Government of India and by the Imperial Government. All that has become possible because you gave communal representation to the Mohammedans in 1909, and because they have become equal, and the apple of discord was removed between them. I will therefore submit that if communal representation is given to us a certain amount of the equality of the non-Brahmins will be recognised by the Brahmins, and equality alone can bring about coalition.

Mr. Bennett.

3240. As a student of politics, you are aware of the theoretical objections to communal representation?—I think I have tried to meet them.

Chairman.

3241. Do you recognise that there are theoretical objections to communal representation?—Yes.

Mr. Bennett.

3242. And unless there are grave practical reasons on the other side there is strong reason to avoid applying the communal principle any more than is necessary?—I did not quite catch that.

3243. You recognise the existence of theoretical objections to the communal principle?—I recognise that.

3244. You and your friends recognise it is through no want of sympathy for you, or no want of consideration for non-Brahmins, that they are reluctant to extend the principle to them?—It is for want of sufficient knowledge of the conditions that they have put them forward.

3245. You have said that you are not anti-Brahmin, but I think you will admit that in stating the case against the Brahmins you have put in as much as you possibly could—you have made your case as strong as you possibly could?—I stated at the beginning that the case could have been put much better if our leader was alive. I am putting it in the humble way in which I could put it.

3246. Do you think you have exaggerated it?—I do not believe so—not willingly, at any rate.

3247. For instance, you say here that the Brahmins hold a lot of land which is revenue free?—Yes.

3248. That seems to indicate that in respect of that land the Brahmins are a privileged class. You say that they are?—I meant it for other purposes. I was thinking of their being free from paying taxes and claiming that we, being taxpayers, ought to get more. It was more for that purpose, I think.

3249. You say amongst the land which is held by the Brahmins is Inam land, which is revenue free. All Inam land is revenue free, is it not? It is land which in the past has been confered for services to the State?—Yes.

3250. And it has remained revenue free ever since?—Yes.

3251. Is it a privileged position which the Inamdar holds? Is it not like all Inam lands? Many men who are not Brahmins hold Inam land, land which is revenue free, do they not?—According to my belief there are very few non-Brahmins who hold Inam lands.

3252. That is only illustrative; I do not press it. You want to lodge a case against Brahmins as much as you can. You say that they do not even pay irrigation assessments because their land is water-bearing land—land with wells upon it?—It is not wells; it is irrigation by canals.

3253. It is land which does not need to draw upon the irrigation system, and therefore they do not contribute to the irrigation assessment—is not that so?—They take water. While others pay taxes for taking water, these lands do not pay.

3254. But they do not take it because it is wet land, is not that so? They are not in need of the irrigation supply?—No; the water is taken for that, but the tax is not paid.

3255. I think you contested a statement made by several of the witnesses, that the antagonisms and divisions between Brahmins and other classes are diminishing—you do not admit that?—No.

3256. You strongly deny it?—Dissensions on account of places are the strongest now.

3257. You say that the Brahmin still maintains his ascendancy?—Yes.

3258. Have you heard of communities which in recent years have dispensed with Brahmin priests?—We have not succeeded in that.

3259. You are aware of a movement in that direction?—Yes.

3260. Do you know that twenty years ago at least in the Deccan the barbers dispensed with the priests? Did you hear of that?—No.

3261. Is there not a tendency to dispense with Brahmins?—We are ouselves trying for that. It is our own movement.

3262. You spoke of the Panchamas: are you aware that the description which you give is practically the same as was given in a well-known book by Abbé Dubois, who wrote at the beginning of the last century? Things are much the same as they were?—I read the book a long time ago, and I do not remember it.

3263. You have said that if the Brahmins had their proportionate number of representatives they would have about three in the Madras Legislative Council?—Yes, judged by one test.

3264. Do you not think you would be doing serious dis-service to your country if you advocated the rejection of Brahmin representation—do you not think you would be excluding a number of good men?—Let us take twelve. I think twelve is the proper number.

3265. Do you not think you would be depriving your country of the services of a number of educated men, and men of experience and character?—I think I referred to that before when I referred to Sidney Low's book on the Governance of Great Britain.

3266. I take it part of your case is that you cannot hold your own against the Brahmins in electoral contests because, first of all, you are not so clever as they: is that your case, that the non-Brahmins are not as clever as the Brahmins?—That is not the primary reason. The primary reason is that they are powerful in the public offices. The second cause also operates.

3267. Amongst the non-Brahmins is there any real scarcity of men of capacity who are fit to take the lead and to represent their fellow-craftsmen?—I think one other member of this Committee gave the names of distinguished non-Brahmin leaders.

3268. To-day amongst your own communities is there a scarcity of men like yourself who are able to take positions?—The one man who has been able to be a real leader of the people has passed away; the others hold only a secondary place, and it remains to be seen how they will develop.

3269. Are there many men of your own type and capacity amongst the non-Brahmins of Madras?—I do not like to admit that I am a leader. I would prefer to be called a follower, whatever the future may bring.

3270. You have said—I am sure you did not mean it as a threat—that if the Bill did not satisfy the expectations of the non-Brahmins of Madras you would organise resistance. I think you referred to what happened in Mr. Gladstone's time. I take it that means a sort of No Rent Campaign, or something of that kind?—I was thinking of "Lord Randolph Churchill's Life," by his son, in which he describes how the Fourth Party was formed and constitutional obstruction was made to the Government.

3271. Supposing the non-Brahmins of Madras are capable of being organised into resistance to the Government, should it not be equally possible to organise them for the assertion of their own political rights in a constitutional way?—I did not mean anything like resistance to the Government. My impression was going into the House and making speeches opposing, and that kind of thing. It is not resistance to the Government in the sense you mean.

Mr. Bennett—continued.

3272. Will you admit that it would be possible to organise the non-Brahmins of Madras in such a way that they could get something like adequate representation by degrees?—It is not possible.

3273. Not at the beginning?—No.

3274. You recognise the advantage that it would be to these people to accustom themselves to public life and political warfare?—That would be possible if things are allowed to go on in their own way; but meanwhile you are not merely enlarging our Councils, but you are giving a large amount of power to the Council and the Ministers. These Ministers and these Councillors being Brahmin will take an early opportunity of consolidating themselves, thus widening the gulf between themselves and the non-Brahmins, and any attempt made by the non-Brahmin leaders to rouse the political conscience of the people will not be sufficient to cope with the advantages which the Brahmins will have.

3275. Is it not worth trying?—It is worth trying if there is any chance or hope of our succeeding. We apprehend that there is no chance of success at all, and we will be driven deeper into the ground.

3276. Would it not be to your interest to accustom your communities to take their proper part in public life?—I think it would be criminal for us not to do so.

Major Ormsby-Gore.

3277. You speak Telugu?—Yes.

3278. Do the people round you speak Telugu—those who live in your neighbourhood?—Yes.

3279. That is to say, Brahmins, non-Brahmins, men of caste and Panchamas all talk Telugu?—Yes, even the Moslems.

3280. Are all the people who speak Telugu Dravidians in race?—Yes, except the Brahmins.

3281. Do you say the Brahmins are a different race to the non-Brahmin Hindoo caste in your part of India?—Yes.

3282. Although they speak the same language:—There are differences in Hindoo law as applied to Brahmins and as applied to non-Brahmins.

3283. One of the grounds for which you ask communal representation is that you are racially distinct in origin from the Brahmins. You are true Dravidians and they are Arians?—Yes.

Chairman.

3284. I want to clear up one question. Without in the least prejudicing your plea for communal representation, you said that the limitation of Brahmin seats was the least objectionable of the alternatives mentioned in the Southborough Committee's Report?—Third alternative.

3285. And you said the limitation that you would suggest under those circumstances would be twelve?—Yes.

3286. Is that twelve out of the proposed members of the elected seats?—Yes, twelve out of sixty-one.

3287. Twelve out of the elected seats?—Yes.

3288. It is not 12 per cent.?—No; it will be more in percentage. Further, they will also get the University seat. The graduates are mostly Brahmins.

(After a short adjournment.)

Mr. RAMA RAYANINGAR, of Panagallu, M.A., F.M.U.; called in, and Examined.

Chairman.

3289. Mr. Rama Rayaningar, you have been good enough to come here representing—you are the delegate, in fact, of the All-India Landholders' Association?—Yes.

3290. And also of the Madras Zemindars and Landholders' Association; and you have been good enough to give us answers to the questions which we sent to you?—Yes.

The questions and answers are as follows:—

1. Do you accept the proposition that it is desirable to bring about the progressive realisation of responsible government in India, and, if so, how do you define the expression "responsible government"? And do you generally accept the proposition contained in the Preamble?—Yes. I would, however, lay stress upon the adjective "progressive." By "responsible" government I understand an executive body responsible to the people under the general supervision of the British Parliament. I accept the proposition contained in the Preamble to the Bill.

2. Do you think that the realisation of responsible government in the provinces involves the establishment in Provincial Legislatures of a substantial elected majority (Clause 6)?—Yes, safeguards, however, being provided for the representation of the several interests and communities according to their importance.

3. Do

3. Do you think that the non-official members of the Provincial Legislatures should possess power to control the actions and policy of the Executive? Do you think they possess such power at present?—Yes, to a certain extent consistent with the idea of the realisation of self-government being gradual. I am inclined to think that the non-official members of the Provincial Legislatures do possess some sort of power to influence—morally, if not legally—the actions and policy of the Executive. The resolutions passed by the Legislative Councils may not be legally binding upon the Executive, but I daresay that the Executive has in very many cases been influenced by such resolutions.

4. Do you think that there are certain matters or functions of Government in the Provinces in which at present the Provincial Executive must remain responsible to the Secretary of State and Parliament, and must therefore be in a position to enforce its wishes?—Yes.

5. If you accept the propositions stated under Questions 1 to 4, do you think that the dual form of government embodied in the Bill is the best means of securing them? If not, what are your objections to that feature of the Bill, and by what other means would you attempt to secure the objects in view?—Undoubtedly the scheme embodied in the Bill is well meant and carefully worked out; but, in view of the possible friction and jealousy between the two parts of the diarchic Government, and mindful of the opposition to the scheme, I am inclined to think that it is not desirable to introduce it, at any rate in its present form in a country like India, where every opportunity is taken to foster prejudice against the British connection with the country. I respectfully submit that a bi-cameral system of Government may be introduced in the Provinces; the Second or Upper Chamber should consist of a bare majority of elected members representing the important vested interests—I mean the landholding, commercial, and industrial interests, and the remaining members of the Chamber should be officials nominated by the Government. This Upper Chamber should be a revising Chamber in matters of all Legislation (which, of course, would include bills of taxation). Every piece of legislation initiated in the First Chamber should be carried through both Chambers. Essential legislation may, however, be introduced on the certification of the Governor in the Second Chamber alone, and will have the finality of law if passed by it. The Budget, however, may be dealt with by the First Chamber alone, and need not be discussed in the Upper Chamber. I would suggest that the subjects of administration should be divided into Provincial and All-India subjects. Some subjects like those proposed by the Government of India in its fourth Despatch, to be treated as transferred subjects of Provincial Governments may be considered as the only Provincial subjects. All other subjects may be treated as All-India subjects, in administering which the Local Governments will be merely the agents of the Government of India. Where the Provincial Governments are merely agents it is obvious that the resolutions of the Legislatures can only be recommendatory. It may be that on some of these subjects Provincial Legislation is necessary. The Government of India may either from time to time or once for all delegate to Local Governments the power of legislating on particular All-India subjects, subject to the Viceroy's veto. The revenues derived from Provincial items should belong to the Provincial Governments. The revenues derived from the All-India items should be handed over to Provincial Governments by the Government of India after deducting a fixed amount (fixed by the proposed Finance Commission) for Central expenditure. The Government of the Provinces shall consist of the Governor and four Executive Council members, of whom two are Indians appointed from the elected members of either House on the recommendation of the Governor and two Europeans of official experience. The Provincial subjects should as far as possible be in the hands of Indian members. There will be a similar bicameral system in the Government of India, but in the Upper Chamber the official members will be in a bare majority. The resolutions, however, shall be advisory.

6. If you have any other method to suggest, does it (i) provide possibilities of advance by stages, and facilitate the "progressive realisation of responsible government," and, if it does, in what way? (Clauses 2, 3, etc.), and (ii) does it afford means of judgment (a) to the electors, and (b) to the Statutory Commission which is to examine and report on progress, of the success or failure in results of the control exercised by the Legislature and those who represent it in the Executive?—(i.) This scheme provides possibilities of advance by making more All-India subjects Provincial subjects in course of time on proved fitness of the people to administer those subjects. (ii.) (a) Yes. (b) Yes.

10. In particular, (i) Do you think that the Legislature should have power with whatever limitations to vote supplies (Clause 9 (2))? (ii.) Do you accept the plan of Grand Committees as the means of giving to the Government the power to secure essential legislation in the event of their failure to carry their propositions in the Council? If so, have you any modifications of detail to suggest? If not, what other method would you suggest to secure the object in view?—(i.) No, not at present. (ii.) No, I have already proposed a second or revising Chamber for the Provinces. These Upper Chambers will afford better facilities of passing essential legislation.

11. Do you accept the position adopted in the Bill (Part II.) that the time has not yet come to give the Legislative Assembly a similar measure of control over the Central Government as that given to Provincial Legislative Councils over Provincial Governments?—Yes.

12. Do you agree that it is advisable, none the less, to provide for a substantial elective majority in the Indian Legislature (Clause 16)?—Yes.

13. Do you accept the plan of a bicameral Legislature as arising out of this, as constituting both a satisfactory machine for the ordinary purposes of legislation, and as affording the means to the Governor-General in Council to secure legislation which he regards as essential (Clauses 14, 15, and 16)?—Yes.

14. Do you accept the provisions of the Bill as to the course of legislation in the Indian Legislature (Clause 20, (3) and (4))? Or do you regard them as unnecessarily restrictive on the popular will, or as an inadequate means of ensuring to the Governor-General in Council the discharge of his responsibilities?—I do not like the provision for a joint sitting of both Chambers. I do not think that at present the joint sitting is advisable. I would prefer the Council of State to be ordinarily a revising Chamber.

15. Do you accept the changes made by the Bill (Clause 21) in the constitution of the Governor-General's Executive Council? If not what are your reasons and what modifications would you suggest?—Yes, with the provision that one of the Members of the Executive Council should be a great landowner.

16. Do you think that the development of Provincial autonomy, on the one hand, and of self-government in the Provinces on the other, involves any modification of the provisions of Sections 2, 33, and 45 of the Government of India Act (Clause 23)?—The rules referred to in Section 23 should be affirmatively passed by the Parliament.

17. Do you agree that the gradual realisation of responsible government involves periodical examination of progress by independent authority, and that the provisions of Clause 23 of the Bill are well designed to afford such examinations?—Yes.

18. Are there any matters which it is proposed in the Bill to deal with by rule which you would suggest should be provided for in the Bill?—The safeguards to representation of important interests and communities should be provided in the Bill itself.

19. Have you any observations to offer on the Reports of Lord Southborough's Committees and of the Committee on the Home Adminstration of Indian Affairs?—My associations are deeply disappointed at the recommendations of the Franchise Committee. The existence of the interests they represent present has not been properly taken into account, and in some instances has been totally ignored. The zemindars and landholders are a special class by themselves in India, with large vested interests. The Joint Report has no doubt alluded to their "position, influence and education," and to their being "the natural and acknowledged leaders in the country areas," but the place that is held out to them in the body politic is not commensurate with their status, their importance, or their usefulness to the State. The landholders pay to the coffers of the State between one-third and one-fourth of the total gross revenue. They should have representation, which should be substantial and such as to protect their interests. Taking the Provincial Councils, their position is, in fact, much worse than what it was under the Minto-Morley reforms. The following table gives an idea of how their position is proposed to be altered very much for the worse in the different Provincial Councils.

Provinces.	In the old Councils.		According to Franchise Report.		Their strength if proportion kept up in New Councils.
	Zemindars and Landholders	Total Elected Members	Landholders.	Total Elected Members.
Madras -	5	21	7	92	23
Bombay -	3	21	3	87	12
Bengal - -	4	28	5	100	13
United Provinces of Agra and Oude		21	6	100	10
Punjab - -	No elected Member	11	4	67	—
Behar and Orissa	5	21	5	73	17
Central Provinces and Behar	2 + 1 (one nominated after election).	7	3 + 1 (one nominated).	53	15
Assam - -	2	11	2	39	7

The last column gives the strength if the proportion fixed in the Minto-Morley Councils is maintained. It should further be remembered that big zemindars and landholders were also nominated by the Local Governments in addition to those who were elected. In Madras, for example, invariably since 1909 one of the nominated seats was given to a Uriya zemindar, and in the present Council there is a second seat given to another zemindar, so that there are really seven zemindars and landowners out of a total of twenty-eight non-official members. I therefore urge respectfully but most emphatically that in all the Provincial Legislative Councils the number of seats given in the last column at least should be given to the landholders and zemindars, and that in the Madras Legislative Council one of the zemindars' seats should be reserved for the Uriya zemindars of Ganjam and Vizagapatam districts. Even with these numbers they cannot have any effective voice in the Legislative Assemblies, but as I have proposed that the Budget allotments should be passed only by this body, we should have at least this proportion of representatives in the Assembly. In the old Councils we were not particular of the exact number of seats we were given, as they were merely advisory bodies, and it was enough if we had opportunities of expressing our views. But under the constitution proposed it is intended to transfer power to the people. We therefore want not only opportunities of expressing our views, which will, in itself, be of very little practical use, but in consideration of the interests that we hold we want an effective voice in the legislation of the Province—at least effective enough to safeguard our interests. Especially in matters of taxation the tendency of the majority of the members of the Provincial Legislative Assembly will be to raise funds for the growing expenditure of the country by imposing taxes which will not affect them, such as, for instance, taxes on land in the form of cess. In fact, Sir James Meston has stated before the Committee that he expects the future Minister to impose such cesses on land. It is obvious that we should have a reasonably effective voice in the matter. The only method by which this can be done is by the adoption of the bicameral system in the Provinces as suggested above. Turning now to the Imperial Legislative Assembly, we find that the Franchise Committee has treated us worse, if possible; whereas in the Councils at present existing we have six out of twenty-six elected seats, the Committee proposes that in the future Assembly we should have ten out of eighty elected seats. We do not see why we should be singled out for sacrifice in this matter. It is not for me to give an account of what we have done in times of exigency to help the Government. The records of the India Government will show it. According to Lord Southborough's Report 261 zemindars and 2,398 landholders have to return one representative to the Imperial Legislative Assembly. This arrangement gives zemindars no chance to send their representative. The interests of zemindars, the holders of permanently settled estates, are often at variance with those of other landholders. In these circumstances I submit there should be separate representation of the Madras zemindars in the Imperial Assembly. But the crowning act of injustice comes in the constitution of the Council of State proposed by the Franchise Committee. Out of twenty-one seats to be given to elected members, the Committee proposes that only two seats should be given to landholders. It is obvious that no zemindar will be returned by the elected members of the Provincial Legislative Councils, whether Mohammedan or non-Mohammedan. Under the scheme of the Franchise Committee, therefore, there will be no zemindar or landholder representative from the Provinces of Madras, Bombay, Punjab, Central Provinces, and Assam. United Provinces will return one member, and Bengal, Behar, and Orissa will return one member. Comment, I think, is needless. The whole of this should, of course, be radically altered. Election should be direct to the Council of State, and one member, at least, should be returned by an electorate of zemindars and great landlords from each Province. My associations urge that provision should be made in the Act for safeguards against the interference of the Legislative Councils interfering with the permanent settlement of the permanently settled estates. My associations would also urge that the more important zemindars, the holders of which were at the time of their subjection to the British Power in possession of sovereign or semi-sovereign powers, may be given a separate administrative existence by giving them the status somewhat similar to that of protected states. Speaking on behalf of the Madras Landholders' Association, I would strongly urge that the non-Brahmins of Madras should be given communal representation through special electorates; without this safeguard the vast majority of the people will be practically disenfranchised, as they will have no independent vote.

3291. You have added to that a little Memorandum which we have read with great interest?—Yes.

3292. Would you like to supplement that Memorandum by a short statement?—I have very little to add, only I have to say that there is a strong feeling among the zemindars that they are not given adequate representation in the Provincial Councils the Imperial Assembly and Council of State. They expected a very much larger representation, but somehow the

the Committee do not appear to have taken into consideration the status and importance of the zemindars and landholders, and they have given them practically very much less representation than they have at present. At present they have the consolation that there is the Government to hold the balance evenly between the politically minded and the landholders, but when the power is transferred to the people matters will be very much worse. They seem to think that the representation that is given to them is practically very little, and they want a very much greater representation, not only in the Provincial Councils, but also in the Imperial Assembly and in the Council of State.

3293. The Legislative Assembly, you mean?—Yes. With regard to the scheme itself, that India is in need of constitutional reforms is a proposition about which there is very little difference of opinion, but when we begin to consider as to how we are to bring about that improvement there is a good deal of difference of opinion. In fact many schemes have been put forward, and amongst them there are some good, some indifferent, and some bad. As to the scheme embodied in the Bill it is one of those conceived in a spirit of sympathy and broad-mindedness, but in spite of that there has been a great deal of criticism against that scheme from various quarters, some of them very important quarters, too. The reason why they criticise the scheme is that it proposes to introduce into the Provinces a dual form of government. The question is whether I am inclined to think that with some modification the scheme might be made free from the charge of introducing dual government into the Provinces. I propose in my Memorandum that, instead of dividing the subjects into All-India subjects, Provincial subjects, transferred and reserved, the subjects might be divided into All-India subjects and Provincial subjects, the Provincial subjects being only those subjects which the Parliament think can be managed by the people of the Provinces. In my opinion those subjects which the Government of India propose to transfer to the Minister's administration will be the subjects for the Provinces; in other words, Provincial subjects. If that arrangement can be made, I think the charge against the Bill that it introduces a dual form of government will lose its force. Then I have also suggested another modification of the Bill, namely, the institution of an Upper Chamber. We are going to try an experiment in this country, and it is much better that we should be cautious in doing so. If there is an Upper Chamber, the errors which an inexperienced House of popular representatives might commit might be revised, for that reason I have asked for the institution of an Upper House. As to the question of the representation of non-Brahmins at Madras, I am strongly of opinion that without such representation the reforms will be no good so far as Madras is concerned. No doubt it is said that the non-Brahmins are in majority, and when the Franchise is broadened they may be still more in the majority, and they may easily manage to capture some of the seats, but the difficulty is that there is so much influence wielded by one community that it would be quite hopeless for them to contend against that influence. That is all I have to say in supplementing the statement I have already made.

3294. May I summarise the points which you wish particularly to bring to our attention as follows: You propose a different division of subjects?—Yes.

3295. You lay great stress on the importance of the principle of a Second Chamber in the Provinces as well as for India?—Yes.

3296. Then you protest very strongly against the proposed allocation of the seats to zemindars and landholders?—Yes.

3297. You point out that, as compared with their representation in the old Councils, they will be very much under-represented in the new Councils?—Yes.

3298. And, lastly, do I understand you to say that you advocate a communal representation for the non-Brahmins in the Madras Presidency?—Yes.

Major Ormsby-Gore.

3299. With regard to the last point, you have always held the view that it would be necessary, in the event of political reforms, to give separate representation in Madras to the Brahmins and non-Brahmins?—Yes.

3300. On the ground, you say, that the Brahmins have influence which might be used to the detriment of some other portions of the population?—Yes.

3301. In what way do you think the Brahmins would abuse the power that they would get by being elected by non-Brahmin constituents?—Firstly, the Brahmins form a large majority in public services, and they exercise some sort of influence or other in getting their own people elected.

3302. You mean, by getting their own people elected, that you think they would tend to use the political power merely in the interests of their own caste, to the detriment of other castes?—Yes.

3303. That is the fear which is entertained in Madras?—Yes.

3304. I will not pursue that further. Now, you more particularly represent the zemindars. Would you explain to me exactly what place the zemindars have in the community in Southern India—what position do they occupy in the social life?—They are mostly non-Brahmins and are landholders.

3305. And they are all cultivators, as well as owners, are they?—No, they are not cultivators; but they are landholders, and they have their own tenants, who cultivate.

3306. What is their main occupation?—The zemindars?

3307. Yes?—Some of them have their own colleges and schools and other charities to manage.

3308. They do take part in public life; they have leisure from the rents they receive for their land in order that they may take part in public life?—Yes.

3309. That is to say, the zemindars really have a very good chance in the reform scheme of taking part in political life and in getting elected for constituencies?—There is not much of that.

3310. You say they take part in the education of the country; they run colleges and schools?—Yes.

3311. Assuming that all classes of education, for the sake of argument, were transferred to a Board of the elected members of the Legislative Council, do the zemindars who engage in education fear that they will be in any way treated detrimentally to their interests and that others will be put in their places?—They have reason to think so.

3312. They have reason for thinking so from what has been happening in the past?—Yes.

3313. You seek for special representation of the zemindars, both in the Provincial Government and in the Central Government in all Provinces?—Yes.

3314. Would you desire that separate communal representation in the Lower Chambers, that is to say, in the Legislative Council and in the Legislative Assembly of the Government of India, if there was a bicameral system, established in both or either?—In both.

3315. You would still want communal representation in the Lower Chamber?—Yes.

3316. Could you give me the sort of idea you have in your mind as to how the Second Chamber should be constituted in your view in the Provinces?—The Second Chamber would have a bare majority of the representatives of the vested interests, that is, of landholders, merchants, people engaged in industries and other distinguished persons.

3317. With the remainder nominated?—Yes; the remaining members to be nominated by the Government.

3318. By the Governor of the Province?—Yes.

3319. Nominated for a period of years, or nominated for life?—For a period of years.

3320. You ask for that system, and even if you got that system you would want the representation of the same vested interests, as you call them, in the Lower Chamber as well?—There are great landlord zemindars and there are also smaller zemindars. Even if an Upper House is instituted, the smaller zemindars would have no chance of representation in that. Sometimes the interests of the great zemindars and the smaller zemindars are at variance.

3321. The other main question which you brought to our attention was the present proposed division of the functions of Government of India into three, namely, All-India subjects, reserved provincial subjects and transferred provincial subjects?—No.

3322. You want the division into two?—Yes.

3323. Namely, All-India subjects and Provincial and transferred subjects?—All India subjects and Provincial subjects; then there would be no transferred subjects.

3324. It would be all transferred?—Yes.

3325. Have you in your mind, or before you, the list of proposed Provincial reserved subjects which you wish to eliminate? You have that in your mind, have you?—I have.

3326. Could you give me some examples from the list of subjects which you think ought to be retained within the immediate purview of the Government of India, and also if there are any subjects in that list which you think should be transferred subjects?—I have said in my Memorandum that all the subjects which the Government of India propose to be transferred to the Provincial Governments might be made Provincial subjects.

3327. That is to say, you do not wish to reserve any of the subjects which are included in that reserved list to the Government of India. You do not want anything kept to the Government of India?—No. There will be All-India subjects for Government of India.

3328. Therefore you want land revenue, irrigation and all these subjects made transferred straight away?—No. I think those subjects which the Government of India proposes to transfer from the Provincial Governments might be made Provincial subjects.

3329. And you want, I take it, then the whole of the reserved list, or what we call the reserved list, such as land revenue, irrigation and the like, kept as All-India subjects?—Yes.

3330. Do you not think that would fail to meet the argument which we have heard for many years in Parliament in this country that one of the main troubles in India at the present moment is over-centralisation in the Government of India, and that everything has to go to Simla if not to go to Whitehall for decision?—I have said, in answering that question, that the Government of India will be administering these subjects through their local agents—that is, the Local Governments.

3331. That is to say, instead of having a Governor in Council administering the reserved subjects in the Provinces, you merely wish the Governor or an official to act for the Government of India. That is to say, there would be no local discretion whatever, but the matter would really be done by agents acting under instructions from Simla and Delhi?—What I mean is that the delegation is not to the Governor alone, but to the Government.

3332. Therefore you want the Provincial Government—that is to say, the Ministers—to act in certain subjects at the orders of the Government of India?—In some cases.

3333. To act as the agents of the Government of India?—Yes.

3334. That is to say, the Ministers would be partly officials of the Government of India in certain subjects, and in other they would be responsible to the Local Legislature?—According to the scheme I suggested there would be no Ministers; all of them would be members of the Executive Council.

3335. Then you would not decribe that, would you, as responsible government in the sense that we use it in this country, namely, as a Government responsible to an elected Chamber?—They are appointed as Executive Members by the Governor from the members of the elected Council.

3336. I will not pursue the matter further.

Mr. Acland.

3337. We are getting more or less accustomed to a system under which you give people a vote, and they exercise a secret Franchise and elect whom they may please, but I can well understand that in India things are not quite like that, and that there may be cases where one class or another will exercise undue influence, insomuch that communal representation may have to be granted, and you have been indicating to us that you think that is necessary with regard to the

Mr. F. D. Acland—continued.

Brahmins and non-Brahmins, that the Brahmin, for one reason or another, exercises so much influence that, even although he is in a very considerable minority, the non-Brahmin must be given a special representation. I find it difficult to reconcile that point of view, which is that the Brahmin is so influential that something must be done to curtail his influence, with your other point of view that another class which is also presumably influential, the landowning class, in spite of that special influence which the ownership of land, and in some cases wealth and position, must give them, are not able to take advantage of that influence to require special representation on their side. Do you see my difficulty?—Yes, but even the landholders are in the hands of the Brahmins in most cases.

Chairman.] Let me clear that up exactly. I do not think the witness has asked for communal representation.

Mr. Acland.

3338. No, not communal representation, but increased representation. I think I am fair in saying that his point is that the representation given to the zemindars is not sufficient, and my argument would be this, that they must clearly be, and no doubt are, persons of class and position, and that that class and position ought to be relied upon without at any rate any increase of their special representation to obtain for them that representation in the Provincial Councils which is due to the position which they enjoy?—Yes, but the landholders, although they are generally a moneyed class, are under certain disabilities. They have litigation, and they have to depend upon pleaders, and the pleaders generally happen to be Brahmins, and it is indeed difficult for them to compete with pleaders.

3339. In England we are accustomed to landowners being very much under the advice of their solicitors, but that does not prevent them from exercising very great influence in elections owing to their great position as landowners, in spite of their reliance on their solicitors in matters of business. You do not find that to be so in India?—The conditions in England are altogether different from the conditions which prevail in India—at any rate, in Madras.

3340. I am trying to get into my mind why it is really that the considerable influence and position which those gentlemen whom you represent undoubtedly must have is not sufficient by itself to obtain for them a due representation in the elected bodies?—Very few of the zemindars are Government officials, and in India, particularly in Madras, the official influence counts for much.

Chairman.

3341. I want to get this quite clear: Are you asking for extra representation for the zemindars or landholders, or do you say that the representation allotted to them is not in proportion to their numbers and the taxes they pay?—It is not in proportion to the importance of their interests.

Mr. Acland.

3342. You think they have, as things really are, very little chance of being elected by the vote of those who are now proposed to be enfranchised?—They have no chance of being elected by the people, I mean, except through their special electorates.

3343. They have no chance of being elected in an ordinary General Election, you mean?—It is so.

3344. Is not that partly due possibly to some defect on their part? Why is it they have no chance? Is it not because they are for some reason unpopular or not trusted?—It is not that they are unpopular, but the others who compete with them have very much greater influence than they.

Lord Islington.

3345. When you say they would have no chance, do you mean they would have no chance if their opponent was a Brahmin?—Yes.

3346. Or would they have no chance against anybody else; which?—Against pleaders who are generally Brahmins.

3347. Is it if the Brahmin is an opponent?—Yes.

3348. Or is it, that if anybody is the opponent they would have no chance?—Whoever has influence with the

the Government and law courts—I mean officials and others. They might be non-Brahmin pleaders, and if a pleader oppose a zemindar the pleader will have a better chance than the zemindar.

3349. If he had a better chance, and was a private individual, as he might be, it would not be due to his connection with the Government, would it? It would be due to his greater facility for attracting votes?—I said so—that it is not only the official influence, but also the influence exercised by the pleaders which gives the zemindars very little chance to be elected.

3350. The pleader has higher electoral ingenuity than the zemindar; is that what you mean?—I think so. He has greater facilities besides.

3351. And you would say the same for the Brahmin?—Yes.

3352. Now you have seen the different proposals to meet this problem in Madras, of the Brahmin and non-Brahmin communities being properly represented in the Legislative Council; which of the different proposals which have been put forward would you prefer?—May I know the proposals?

3353. There is a proposal for their being arranged in communal constituencies, and then there is the other proposal that there should be a limit to the number of Brahmins who can be elected?—Yes, separate electorates; that is communal constituencies would be best.

3354. Failing that, if it came to a question of a limit of number, would you say that the proposal which is now thrown out by the Government of India is a fair one?—I think it is thirty out of sixty-one?—The Government of India, no doubt, says that thirty seats should be reserved for non-Brahmins, but I am not quite sure whether those thirty seats are in plural constituencies or separate constituencies. The Government of India is not clear upon that point. They say thirty out of sixty-one should be reserved for non-Brahmins.

3355. Do you consider that a fair proportion or not?—I do not quite understand what they mean—whether they mean plural constituencies or special constituencies.

3356. Assuming they mean plural constituencies, would you say that was a fair proportion to meet the problem?—The formation of plural constituencies has its disadvantages, namely, the rural representation will suffer considerably, and at the same time by plural constituencies both Brahmins and non-Brahmins have to return a non-Brahmin.

3357. I suppose the separate communal constituency will present difficulties too, will it not?—I do not know how it would present difficulties.

3358. You say that the proposed proportion of zemindar seats is inadequate; what do you suggest?—They should be at least in the proportion in which they are given by Minto-Morley Reforms.

3359. Can you reduce that to figures?—I am informed that you have got it on your statement?—Yes.

3360. One word with regard to the constitution of the new Executive Councils. You are not in favour of the proposal, I understand, of a diarchic system?—Not as it is.

3361. You would prefer to see a unified Government?—Yes.

3362. Consisting of how many would that be—two Europeans and two Indians?—Yes.

3363. And you would place all the transferred subjects in the hands of that Government and make them responsible to the Legislative Council?—Yes.

3364. The case that is made against that is that, by unifying the Government, you cannot place the responsibility on the Indian Minister. How do you get over that difficulty?—I have not followed your question.

3365. The case that is made against a unified Government is that, by placing the responsibility upon both the European and Indian element together in the unified Government, you are not thereby sufficiently placing the responsibility on the Indian Minister in his relation to the Legislative Council?—The administration of the subjects, the particular portfolios will be in the hands of Indian members.

3366. The portfolios would be in the hands of the Indian members, but, under your system, I suppose any question of higher importance would be decided upon by the whole Government, and not by the Minister?—By the whole Government, yes.

3367. You would give the responsibility to the whole Government?—Yes.

3368. You consider that, by a plan of that character, you will get a Government sufficiently responsible to the Legislative Council?—There may be some responsibility attaching to the Legislative Council, because two of them are members elected from there, and then it does not follow that in all cases the Governor will vote with the other members. These two members may be able to influence the other members.

3369. Any way, your proposal differs from the alternative proposal to this extent: I understand not merely that you would like to see all questions discussed in a single Cabinet, but all questions decided upon in a single Cabinet?—Yes.

3370. As distinguished from being decided upon by the Minister himself?—That is so.

Lord Sinha.

3371. Are there any Mohammedan landlords in the Madras Presidency?—There are very few.

3372. I mean Mohammedan land-holders other than zemindars?—There may be a few.

3373. None that you know of?—There are some.

3374. Some belonging to both classes; zemindars and land-holders other than zemindars is the division?—Yes, I know there are some in Malabar. I do not know the tenure under which they hold their lands, and unless I know that I do not think I will be able to answer whether they are zemindars or land-holders.

3375. Do they take part in elections at present for the existing Councils?—Yes. So far as the Imperial Legislative Council is concerned, both the land-holders and the zemindars vote. In a common electorate they have a vote, but I do not know whether they exercise their vote as land-holder or zemindar.

3376. You are aware of the Report, and the grounds upon which the recommendations of the Southborough Committee's Report were based as regards, firstly, zemindars, and secondly, land-holders other than zemindars. Do you know their grounds for their recommendations?—Yes.

3377. As regards zemindars, it is because they belong to a special distinct class?—Yes.

3378. It is upon that ground that they have allowed existing privileges to remain; that is their basis, is it not? I do not ask what your objection is, but the basis of Lord Southborough's Committee is that he has only allowed existing privileges for what might be called a distinct class to remain?—Yes.

3379. Similarly, with regard to smaller landlords, it is only where they are a distinct class that he has allowed the privilege to remain?—Yes.

3380. In other respects, his Report, or the Committee's Report, is that the land-owning classes should take their chance with all other classes in territorial electorates?—Yes.

3381. You know, of course, the scheme put forward by the Madras Government?—Yes.

3382. That was a case of special electorates all round—not territorial electorates?—Yes; special electorates.

3383. And on that basis they allotted four members to the zemindars—that is the old genuine landed aristocracy—and six to the landholders other than the zemindars?—Yes.

3384. You remember that, do you not?—Yes.

3385. It is on pages 121 and 122 of Command Paper 141. That was ten out of ninety-five, I think, was it not?—Ninety-one I thought was the number.

3386. It is about that, any way?—Yes.

3387. And the Southborough Report gives you special electorates, seven out of ninety-nine, and also leaves it open to both classes of the landowning people to take whatever chance they have in the general electorates or territorial electorates?—My impression is that the recommendation of the Madras Government also gives them the chance.

3388. The Madras recommendation was on the basis—the one I read to you—of special electorates all round—no territorial electorates?—Yes; they could at the same time compete for other seats.

3389. Are you satisfied with that—ten special seats and a chance of getting in wherever else they could?—No.

3390. You are not satisfied with that either?—That will not put us in the position in which we find ourselves selves at present; that is to say at present we have a proportion of—— 3391. You are thinking of the proportion, not of the number of seats?—Yes.

3392. Amongst the rural seats, there are fifty-two non-Mohammedan rural seats in the districts?—Yes.

3393. And the landowning class will not be able, in your opinion, to capture any out of the fifty-two?—Not the bigger landholders.

3394. Nor the smaller ones?—Some of the smaller ones may.

3395. What is the proportion, do you think, out of the fifty-two all over the Presidency?—Even the landholders' seats are captured by other people—for instance, the zemindar seats in the Imperial Legislature Council at present from Madras are captured by the Brahmins.

3396. What I am pointing out to you is that the voters for these rural seats are people who will be paying rent to these very landlords?—Yes.

3397. Do you think, notwithstanding the fact that the electors are their own tenants, they would not be able to capture any considerable number, at any rate, out of the fifty-two seats?—I do not think they would be able to capture many; they might capture a few.

3398. Is it because of their want of organisation or education or public spirit?—Neither of these, but it is because the members of the legal profession the moment they want to compete with the zemindars create some misunderstanding between the tenants and the zemindars, and there will be no chance for the zemindars to get votes from their tenants.

3399. I see; then it is not due to any lack of public spirit or public service or education or anything of that kind that the landlords are kept back?—No, it is not.

3400. So far as those qualifications are concerned they will be on a par with the pleaders, and everybody else?—I cannot say on a par with them, but they will be fairly well off.

3401. And with regard to urban seats, will the landlords have no chance whatever?—Much less than in the case of rural seats.

3402. The urban seats are nine?—Their chance will be much less in the case of urban seats.

3403. Much less than in the country?—Yes.

3404. With regard to your bicameral legislature, is it your idea that those special interests like that of landlords should be represented both in the Lower Chamber and in the Upper Chamber as a special class?—There are different classes of zemindars; there are holders of impartable estates and those of partable estates.

3405. We have got two, zemindars and landlords other than zemindars?—Among the zemindars themselves there is a class of zemindars holding what are known as impartible and inalienable estates; the holders of such estates will form a class of zemindars for the Upper House.

3406. That is practically rajahs and principalities?—Yes.

3407. You will put them in the Upper Chamber?—Yes.

3408. And the other landlords?—They could compete for membership in the Lower Chamber.

3409. In the general electorate?—Yes, in zemindars' electorates.

3410. You would not put them, by special electorates, in a special class?—Yes. By special electorates.

3411. You would have special electorates for zemindars in both Chambers?—No, not in the Lower Chamber.

3412. It is about the Lower Chamber I ask; in the Lower Chamber would you let the landowning classes come in through the general electorates, and only through the general electorates?—I understood your Lordship meant zemindars' electorates.

3413. If you had two Chambers, an Upper and a Lower, for the Lower Chamber would you be content to let the landowning classes come in through general electorates, or would you also insist upon special electorates?—I would insist upon special electorates.

3414. So that you would have special electorates for both the Upper and the Lower Chambers?—Yes.

3415. Just as you have now in the one Chamber?—Yes.

3416. Do you not think that would be over-representation of special classes?—The smaller zemindars would not be eligible to get into the Upper Chamber. Therefore it is only one particular class of zemindars who will be eligible to get into the Upper Chamber.

3417. Now, with regard to the Executive Government in the Provinces, under your scheme you take, I think you said, two out of the four from the elected members of the Legislature?—Yes.

3418. And the other two would be European officials of experience and standing?—Yes.

3419. Would your two Indian members be responsible to the Legislature—that is to say, amenable to dismissal by vote of want of confidence?—There is no such provision even in the scheme embodied in the Bill.

3420. Never mind the scheme now; you say that the scheme is not right and is not workable; I am asking about your scheme; under your scheme, when you put in two out of four from the elected members, would they hold office in such a way that if there was a vote of want of confidence by the Legislature they would have to resign?—Not legally bound to resign; but they would have to do it, because they would not command its confidence, and in other matters, too, the Council could cause trouble to them.

3421. As a Convention you take it that the Ministers or that the two Indian members of the Executive Council should resign if the Legislature had no longer confidence in them?—It comes to that.

3422. It is that and nothing else?—Yes.

3423. And they would also resign if the Governor had no confidence in them; they would be dismissed?—They are in charge of the Portfolios which are entirely Provincial subjects.

3424. Provincial subjects would be in charge of all four, I thought?—No.

3425. The Agency subjects you would give to the European members—that is to say, the subjects in which the members would act as agents for the Government of India you would give to the European members?—Yes. I have said so.

3426. That comes to very much the same as the reserved and transferred, does it not; the reserved remaining with the European members and the transferred going to the Indian members?—If they are all Provincial subjects.

3427. Only under your scheme the reserved subjects and the members of the Government in charge thereof remain in an extra degree liable to the Government of India?—I do not think there would be a dual form of Government for this reason, that a dual form of Government is said to exist when the functions of the same Government are divided, but in my scheme there is not that division of the functions of the Provincial Governments, but in administering local imperial subjects, Provincial Governments will be the agents of the superior Government, and therefore I do not think there will be dualism.

3428. It would be dual to this extent, I suppose, that one part of it would be amenable to the Government of India?—Yes.

3429. And the other part would be amenable to the Legislature—to the Provincial Legislative Council?—I do not quite follow you? How is it dual?

3430. Because you said the Indian Ministers would have to resign if the Legislative Council had no confidence in them?—So far as Provincial subjects are concerned, they will be in charge of Provincial subjects.

3431. That would not apply to the two European officials, would it?—They would be exercising their power as agents of the Government of India.

3432. Therefore, they would not have to resign if the Legislature had no confidence in them?—No.

3433. But the Indians would?—Yes.

3434. Therefore, they would be subject to different control, one part to the Government of India——?—You mean the Indian members?

3435. The European members would be subject to the Government of India, and the Indian members to the Legislature?—Yes.

3436. Is not that dualism also?—I do not think so.

3437. Have you read the scheme put forward by the five heads of the Local Governments?—Yes.

3438. Is your scheme anything like theirs?—It is not.

3439. Have you read the scheme put forward by the Bombay Government, Lord Willingdon's Government?—No. I read the scheme of the heads of Government

3440. The one appended to the Government of India's Despatch

Despatch of the 5th March?—Yes. I glanced through it.

3441. You know that Bombay Government scheme, where there are three Indian members and one European member, and no division of subjects; you know that scheme?—Yes. I have an idea of it.

3442. Which do you prefer, your scheme or the Bombay Government scheme?—I think mine.

3443. That is the answer.

Sir Henry Craik.

3444. You say in your paper that you have laid before us that you think the diarchic or dual system of government is undesirable, because it would lead to friction?—Yes.

3445. Perhaps you would just specify one or two things in which you think it would lead to friction—For instance, the Indian members might probably want to please the Legislative Councils, and then the European members probably might not go with them.

3446. Do you think that the element of friction in this system would arise from the fact that a Government composed of Ministers and Executive officials nominally upon a joint reference would yet very possibly be divided upon very essential points?—Yes.

3447. And very naturally that, you think, might lead to friction?—Yes.

3448. Now you propose, as is shown by your examination by Lord Sinha, another course, that certain subjects that you think Provincial subjects should be handed over to Ministers responsible to the elected assemblies, and with very ample powers in regard to them?—Yes.

3449. Only subject to occasional emergency interference on the part of the Government. On the other hand, you propose with regard to All-India subjects that these should be in the hands of the Governor and his executive officers responsible to the Governor-General and through him to the Secretary of State and Parliament here?—Yes.

3450. You think that these two functions might be quite separate, and would not interfere with one another?—Yes.

3451. You might, in short, under the system of the transferred powers, give a very large amount of independence to the Ministers, which might by degrees, as you thought fit, be increased, while you reserved to the supervision of the Governor and his executive officers, subject to the supervision of the Governor-General and the Secretary of State, those reserved subjects which you prefer to call All-India subjects?—Yes.

3452. You think your line of advance would be rather in extending, as time seemed to justify, the number of the transferred subjects?—Yes.

3453. And lessening the number of the reserved subjects?—Yes.

3454. You think that that would avoid the friction which you fear under the diarchic system?—I think so.

3455. You look upon that as a possible method of constitutional advance?—I think so.

Sir J. D. Rees.

3456. I have your name here as Mr. Rama Rayaningar, representing the Madras Landholders' Association?—Yes.

3457. Are you of Madras yourself?—Yes, I am of the Madras Presidency.

3458. The questions which Lord Sinha asked you have shortened my task, but still I am not quite clear what exactly you represent. The word "zemindar" means any landholder, as you know, from the land of a tennis-court to a county. Do you really represent the great zemindars, and if so is there any limit—how is your particular electorate determined?—My electorate is determined by the electors who have a net income of at least Rs. 15,000 a year.

3459. I used the word "electorate" in a picturesque sense. Who is it, please, that you represent? Do you represent the zemindars in the sense in which I think Lord Sinha used the word, and as it is usually used, of the great landlords?—The great landlords.

3460. You mean them?—Yes, I think that word is used in a double sense; there are permanently settled landholders and ordinary landholders. I represent the former.

3461. Do you claim to represent the ryot who pays about £1 a year to the Government?—I do not represent that class.

3462. Not at all?—No.

3463. Then I understand, more or less, that your landholders mean the great landholders?—Yes.

3464. How long has your Association been in existence?—What Association?

3465. The one you represent?—I represent two Associations.

3466. Either or both?—They have been in existence for the last two years or so.

3467. They are very young?—Not very young. They came into existence about two years back.

3468. Who are the members; are the great zemindars of the South members of this Association?—Yes; which Association do you mean?

3469. There are two—the All-India and the Madras?—I could give you some prominent names, such as the Maharajah Bahadur of Darbhanga, the Maharajah of Burdwan, and others, so far as the All-India landholders are concerned.

3470. You are in Calcutta a great deal?—I am a member of that Association, and I have been asked to represent them.

3471. You are their Secretary, and their representative here?—Yes, I am their representative.

3472. You are in correspondence now with the zemindars and others you have mentioned; you are with them all the time?—Yes, I am in correspondence with them.

3473. You say that unless there is more representation for these great landlords you represent, this scheme of reforms dealt with in the Bill must rather fail; is that your contention?—There would be discontent among the zemindars.

3474. Amongst those great landlords? Yes.

3475. Taking your Memorandum here, is it the opinion of your Association that if the Maharajah of Vizianagram or the Rajah of Ramnad, or any similar great landholder submitted himself for election, he would have no chance of being elected by the general electorate?—I do not think either would have any chance.

3476. That is the opinion of your Association?—Yes.

3477. In wishing that extra representation for the great landlords, that does not connote or imply any sympathy with the movement as an anti-Brahmin movement, does it?—There is no anti-Brahmin movement.

3478. There is no such thing, you say; at any rate, if there is, you are not with it?—There is no movement of the sort; there is no anti-Brahmin movement.

3479. Where is Panagallu?—It is in the Nizam's dominions.

3480. You are familiar with this question, and you can say that there is no high caste versus low caste movement?—You did not say high caste and low caste before, but you said "anti-Brahmin movement"?—I did, but it has become very much the same thing, has it not? It has not developed into that.

Chairman.] The witness is quite right, anti-Brahmin was the form of the question.

Sir J. D. Rees.

3481. Do not the representatives of the land represent the general public; would you not say so?—In what respect?

3482. Generally speaking; seeing that the great majority of the people of India are landholders from petty puttadars, up to the great zemindars, would you not say that they generally represented the interests of the Indian public?—The Indian public has such a wide meaning; in what respect do they represent the public?

3483. Is not 80 per cent. of the Indian public connected with the land?—Yes.

3484. Would you make any distinction between the interests of that 80 per cent. and the interests of the great landlords?—There is conflict of interests in some cases.

3485. Generally?—How can I say generally? If the question of tenure is taken up there is conflict of interests between the zemindar and the tenant: but if the question of caste is taken, they are at one with each other.. So that if you will kindly limit your questions to a particular point I will answer.

3486. You are asking for more representation for the great landowners?—Yes.

3487. The purpose of my question was to ask you whether those who succeed in holding the ordinary seats will not, as a rule, be representatives of land-holders—perhaps not of the great ones—and then to ask if there is any distinction between the interests of the great and the small?—In some matters there is a conflict of interest, and in some matters there is not.

3488. I should like to ask you this general question: A great deal has been said—Mr. Acland, for instance, spoke of the influence of the Brahmins as being very great. But is it so great because they are Brahmins, or because of the qualities they have?—Because they happen to belong to a community which is held in respect according to the religious usage? That is one reason, and another reason is that either they or their relations happen to be in Government service in large numbers. They are pleaders and priests.

3489. Do they maintain their position which they achieve by their personal capacity? Are they equal or not to the position which the Indian public ascribe to them?—Yes.

3490. Did I rightly understand you to say—I might have been mistaken here, and very likely I was—that where the pleaders are Brahmins they rather serve the interests of the Brahmins as well as or in preference to the interests of their clients?—In India, at any rate, the sympathy for the class or caste is greater than the sympathy for the profession.

3491. Do you think that lawyers like Mr. Bashyem Iyengar and Sir Subramania Iyer and the like made great fortunes by not preserving the interests of their clients?—They are paid for it, of course; they are interested in pleading for them, because they are paid for it.

3492. Do you think that the reason that the bigger landowners have not had sufficient representation hitherto has been that they have been backward in submitting themselves to election; that they have been shy about coming forward?—It is not only that, but they would have little chance of being successful in the competition.

3493. That is your opinion?—One or two who might have had a good chance may not have cared, but the majority of them have little chance of success against the official influence and the influence of the vakils and others.

3494. Do you advance that as a general proposition, of the Nizam's dominions, or as to India generally?—In Madras—I am speaking of my own experience in Madras.

3495. I would like to ask you if you believe in democratic government?—Democratic government which is to be responsible to the people; not at once, but in the course of time.

3496. We will put it in the words of the announcement; do you believe in the progressive realisation of democratic government?—Yes.

3497. I put it to you that as we progress towards democracy in India it may be a very long way that we have to go. Is it not desirable; in fact, is it not necessary that we should dispute the power of vested interest—that is, class interest?—You must give that class which has vested interests a chance to take to other paths and avocations before you will get rid of their vested interests—not until them.

3498. You are here, according to this statement, representing a certain specific interest?—Yes.

3499. You are asking in this statement for "an effective voice in the legislation of the Province, at least effective enough to safeguard our interests?—Yes.

3500. I would put it to you that really the nation's interest should be the first consideration, should it not?—The zemindars form part of the nation.

3501. They form part of the nation, that is true; they are a distinct class in the nation?—They are.

3502. But the national interests should come first?—I do not understand what you mean by national interest. I thought the interests of all must be considered.

3503. I put it to you as a democrat—and you have confessed yourself to be one a moment ago—that the ultimate goal in India, as elsewhere, with those of us who are democrats, is manhood and womanhood suffrage?—Of course, that is the ultimate goal.

Mr. Spoor—continued.

3504. If that is the goal, would not the proposals which you put forward——?—May I interrupt you first. I want to make myself clear about that point, and I think I have not followed you quite well. I would like to know whether you mean by democracy an absolute democracy.

3505. Ultimately, yes?—I said democracy I do not contemplate, absolute democracy or responsible government, because I say that such a responsible government as should be subject to the general supervision of the Parliament I cannot call an absolute democracy.

3506. But we are progressing towards that?—Towards what?

3507. Towards the absolute democracy of which I speak?—That I do not contemplate, because I do not want to have the British connection severed.

3508. I want to stick to this word "progressive." You say, here, that you would lay stress upon the adjective "progressive," and I am submitting that, as a matter of fact, your proposals are not progressive—they are really reactionary?—I do not know about that.

Chairman.] Surely that is a matter of opinion.

3509. It is a matter of opinion. (To the Witness.) Is it not reactionary to seek to perpetuate the caste system?—I am not seeking to perpetuate the caste system.

3510. You are asking, I take it, for communal representation?—That is a provision for the existing castes. I am not asking for the institution of caste itself. Castes exist whether you get responsible government or not; castes have been existing, and I believe they will exist for a long time to come. There must be provision for the representation of existing castes.

3511. Will not the tendency be, once it is incorporated in some statutory enactment, to perpetuate a system that you yourself do not believe in?—I believe otherwise, because there is no provision for communal representation; there is friction between the two communities or castes, and if provision be made for their separate representation, at least one cause for friction between the two communities will be removed—that is, contest in the elections—by making such provision, they will be separated, and therefore each has nothing to complain so far as the election question is concerned against the other. For instance, we know that the Mohammedans and Hindoos were fighting like anything in electoral contests, and the moment their interests were separated, the moment communal electorates were given, the Mohammedans and the Hindoos became friends.

3512. If the representation of this particular vested interest you represent is increased, as you ask, are you not thereby strengthening that vested interest?

Chairman.] He is not asking for communal representation for them.

Mr. Spoor.] I am coming now to the point of vested interests, for which he asks to be given special representation.

Chairman.] I only want to make it clear that he does not ask to have communal representation for the zemindars.

Mr. Spoor.

3513. No. I have left that point, and I am now on the question of vested interests. (To the Witness.) If you get an increased representation for the particular interest which you ask for are you not thereby strengthening that vested interest?—I do not think so; the same answer applies to this. The answer I have given in the case of communities or castes will apply to this, because there may be conflict between interest and interest, and there may be friction between those who have those interests, so that by separating those interests—by giving them separate seats—you will naturally minimise friction between those interests.

3514. Therefore you do not think it would be reactionary?—I may be a zemindar to-day and a merchant to-morrow. They give such representation in other countries; Labour is represented in England in the House of Commons, and so on, and there are several interests separately represented. Are the advocates of such representation reactionaries?

Mr. Spoor—continued.

3515. You do not think, then, that it is at all reactionary to ask for this real increase of power for this particular vested interest? You do not think it is reactionary? You think it is a progressive step towards the realisation of a democratic government?—I do not ask for any more representation than we have. I am asking for the representation which we now enjoy, and therefore you cannot say that I am reactionary. I do not go behind that.

Chairman.

3516. There is only one question which Lord Sinha would like to put to you in addition to those he has asked: Have either of the associations to which you belong passed any resolution or put in any memorial to the same effect as your evidence to-day with regard to the Reform scheme?—Yes, both the Associations have done so. I have to give some explanation at this stage; may I do so?

3517. About what?—About the answer to this question.

3518. Shortly?—Subsequent to the memorials that have been submitted, there was a lot of criticism about the practicability of the scheme proposed, and we had a talk about it and we said we could approve of the diarchy only if it is reasonably modified so as to minimise the criticism which it might be exposed to.

(The Witness is directed to withdraw.)

Mr. B. P. WADIA is called in; and Examined, as follows:—

Chairman.

3519. Mr. Wadia, I think you are President of the Madras Labour Union?—I am.

3520. You have been good enough to hand in this statement which we have all read?—Yes.

The statement is as follows:

Labour in India may be divided into three classes: (1) Agricultural—including that on plantations; (2) Mining; (3) Factory. I am fairly familiar with the bad conditions from which labour in India in all these industries suffers, but my intimate experience is related to factory labour in Madras. I am the President of the Madras Labour Union, formed in Madras on the 27th April, 1918. This Union has already had an interesting career; it has had to struggle not only to grow, but even to exist, and has survived two lock-outs on the part of certain employers. Since then several other Unions have been established in the city of Madras. The Madras Tramwaymen's Union has emerged successfully out of two strikes; the Rickshawallah's Union came into existence in the midst of a strike; the remaining two, the Printers' and the Railway Workshops Unions were the last to be formed. At Negapatam a strong Union of railwaymen has been formed, and is rooted in firm ground. I have had the honour and privilege to initiate and organise this work in India, and from Bombay, Calcutta, Cawnpore and Lucknow I have received invitations from working men to visit their cities and organise Unions. The pressure of public work in hand has made it impossible for me to visit them, but I am planning to organise them on my return to India.
